

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

Heralds of American literature

Annie Russell Marble

810.9

M 312

HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

1. 1.

Father Abraham in his STUDY.

He's rarely scorn'd in } Good-Nature, Wit, and Judgment round him wait ;
 Censure or in Praise ; } And thus he fits imbro'd in Classick-State :

THE SHADE of Him who Counsel can bestow,
 Still pleas'd to teach, and yet not proud to know ;
 Unbia'd or by Favour or by Spite ;
 Nor dully prepossess'd, nor blindly right ;
 Tho' learn'd, well-bred ; and, tho' well-bred, sincere ;
 Modestly bold, and humanely severe ;
 Who to a Friend his Faults can sweetly show,
 And gladly praise the Merit of a Foe.
 Here, there he sits, his cheerful Aid to lend ;
 A firm, unshaken, uncorrupted Friend,
 Averse alike to flatter or offend.

To Failings mild, but zealous for Desert ;
 The clearest Head, and the finest Heart.

Few Men deserve our Praises other Ways.

Printed by Benjamin Mecom, at the New Printing-Office, (near the TOWN-HOUSE, in Boston) where BOOKS are Sold, and PRINTING-WORK done, Cheap.

Title-page of Father Abraham's Advice, Boston, 1760; from copy in Boston Public Library.

Heralds of American Literature

A GROUP OF PATRIOT WRITERS OF THE REVOLUTIONARY AND NATIONAL PERIODS

By
MRS. ANNIE (RUSSELL) MARBLE, M.A.

Chicago: The University of Chicago Press
London: T. Fisher Unwin, 1 Adelphi Terrace
1907

COPYRIGHT 1907 BY
THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO

Published November 1907

Composed and Printed By
The University of Chicago Press
Chicago, Illinois, U. S. A.

English
Wilson
7-7-34
29257

PREFACE

Each decade calls forth a more detailed study of the beginnings of American history. The lives of our pioneer soldiers and statesmen have been narrated in many volumes. On the other hand, the writers who prophesied, and sought to promote, a national literature during the early days of American independence have not been so generally studied, except in groups. Moses Coit Tyler individualized scores of Colonial and Revolutionary versifiers and satirists, but the self-imposed limits of his theme prevented him from completing the later services of some of these writers, after the Revolution. He did not live to accomplish a similar work in biography for the patriot-writers of the National period in which American government, industry, and education were slowly established. The aim of this book is to recount, in detailed study and largely from original sources, the lives and services of a group of typical writers during the pioneer days of national growth, who revealed the standards and aspirations of their time and who announced the dawn of a national literature, although their own products were often immature and crude.

In my researches, which have extended over many years, I have had valuable assistance from librarians at Harvard, Yale, Brown, and Princeton Universities, the Library of Congress, the Lenox Library of New York, the Athenaeum and Public Library of Boston, the American Antiquarian Society and Public Library at Worcester, and Pequot Library at Southport, Connecticut. I would also acknowledge indebtedness to the Historical Societies of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Connecticut, and Massachusetts. For editorial suggestions I am grateful to members of the faculty of the University of Chicago. Descendants of some of these early writers, and many individuals, have given me generous interest and co-operation. Four of the chapters, in abbreviated form, have been printed in the New England Magazine, and one in the Critic. Thanks are due the editors of these journals for permission to reprint.

A. R. M.

LIST OF ILLUSTRATIONS

1. FRONTISPIECE: FATHER ABRAHAM IN HIS STUDY. From a copy of Franklin's "Father Abraham's Advice," 1760, in Boston Public Library.
2. FRANCIS HOPKINSON. From a painting by R. Pine, 1785, engraved by J. B. Longacre; facing page 19.
3. FRANCIS HOPKINSON'S "BATTLE OF THE KEGS." From an early broadside in American Antiquarian Society Library; facing page 41.
4. PHILIP FRENEAU. From a print, long owned by Dr. Emmett, made from crayon sketch; facing page 61.
5. JOHN TRUMBULL. From a painting by the artist, John Trumbull, 1793; facing page 107.
6. TITLE-PAGE OF "M'FINGAL," first edition, Philadelphia, 1775. From copy in Watkinson Library, Hartford; facing page 130.
7. TITLE-PAGE OF "THE ECHO," New York, 1807; facing page 161.
8. JOSEPH DENNIE. From a portrait long owned by the family, possibly painted by Charles W. Peale; facing page 193.
9. TITLE-PAGE OF "THE LAY PREACHER," first edition, 1796. From copy in American Antiquarian Society Library; facing page 228.
10. TITLE-PAGE OF WILLIAM DUNLAP'S PLAY, "ANDRÉ," 1798; facing page 255.
11. CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN. From a miniature painted by William Dunlap, 1806, engraved by J. B. Forrest; facing page 279.

CONTENTS

CHAPTER	PAGE
I. INTRODUCTORY: SIGNS OF THE DAWN—THE IMPULSE OF FRANKLIN	2
II. FRANCIS HOPKINSON	19\
III. PHILIP FRENEAU: AMERICA'S FIRST POET	61
IV. JOHN TRUMBULL: SATIRIST AND SCHOLAR	107
V. A GROUP OF HARTFORD WITS	149
VI. JOSEPH DENNIE: "THE LAY PREACHER"	193
VII. WILLIAM DUNLAP: THE BEGINNINGS OF DRAMA	235
VIII. CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN	279
BIBLIOGRAPHY	319
INDEX	355

INTRODUCTORY: SIGNS OF THE DAWN
—THE IMPULSE OF FRANKLIN

I

INTRODUCTORY: SIGNS OF THE DAWN —THE IMPULSE OF FRANKLIN

The strong impulses of every epoch in a nation's life are impressed upon the pages of contemporary literature. The awakening, on the part of the American colonists, of a spirit of remonstrance against English misrule, the drift of sentiment toward independence, and the slow, toilsome victory in war and establishment of a republic, were expressions of a vital period in the world's history. The motives behind the events were prophesied and narrated by the writers of this age of transition, who lived amid its scenes. In literary style their work does not rank high; but their services to America, in her political agitations and her initial progress in arts and education, deserve some attention beyond the usual "honorable mention."

Research among the unfamiliar writings by American patriots of the past has compensation for much which baffles and disappoints. Within their lives were heroic deeds and blighting failures, and the varied incidents form an interesting record. They portrayed the customs and standards of their own time, in industry, society, and morals, with a realism and faithfulness which cannot be fully reproduced. The bulk of what is called American literature, from 1765 to 1815, was immature and crude, according to the rules of criticism, but within it are suggestions of nature-study, poetry, and romance, against a background of native scenery. Later authors wove these elements into effective fabrics.

4 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

For many years the question has been discussed: Has America a literature of her own; and, if so, when did it begin? Only within recent times would one venture to affirm the independent existence of such a literature. The specious argument, that everything written in the English language belongs to English literature exclusively, has been nullified. We identify patriots today by the spirit, not by the letter, of their writings.

American nationality was evolved and established between 1765 and 1815. The inherent aims of the new nation were gradually dissociated from those of England, and the divorce was recognized for many decades. During the latter part of the nineteenth century the true racial bonds have again been openly emphasized. Why should the writings of this formative era of American federation, the direct impressions and records of the dawning national spirit, be still discounted as American literature? The themes of these early writers were localized, and their vision was often distorted; yet a unity of purpose distinguished their prose and crude verse from the products of the British colonists in America prior to 1765. The dominant quality of the later writings was that rugged sincerity which is "the essence of originality," as Carlyle has declared.

Colonial verse showed a marked advance from the mawkish couplets of Wigglesworth and grotesque musings of Mistress Anne Bradstreet, to the ballads and lyrics of Dr. Benjamin Prime and William Livingstone, which were popular during the last half of the eighteenth century. In prose also there was progress in literary form, which is seen by comparing the labored pages of the early annalists and preachers with the compulsive logic of Jonathan Edwards, the Journal of John Woolman, and the varied writings of Benjamin Franklin.

As statesman, as ingenious scientist, and as writer of pure, strong English, Franklin has gained a world-wide recognition for which it is not necessary to argue. He was a representative of the highest Colonial development along industrial and educational paths. His style was confessedly modeled after that of the best English essayists, and it was disturbed by no uncouth efforts to seem "American." At the same time, perhaps unconsciously, Franklin introduced notes of democracy and Americanism into his epigrams and treatises, long before the ideas or the words had come into vogue, and while the colonists in America were loyal and contented subjects of Great Britain.

6 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

One of the people by birth and hard-won success, Franklin wrote for the common people, not for the aristocracy or the lettered. His Almanacks, and his counsels by Father Abraham and Poor Richard appealed to the mind and ambition of the populace. In his later life, famous as scientist, diplomat, and wit, he was in favor with the élite of Europe; but in his early manhood, and in most of his writings, he was democratic in thought and associations. He familiarized the common people with the wit and wisdom of the English essayists whom he admired. He believed that he could increase the thrift and industry of the masses, even as he could lighten their drudgery, by pungent sentences which would be easily acquired and quoted. His activities and his writings were utilitarian in aim. He advised the individual to increase his material resources, but also to broaden and sweeten his mind by contact with good literature of practical value.¹ His pages were always readable, from the youthful Dogood Papers, which he persistently thrust under the door of the newspaper office for six months until they were published, to the Bagatelles and Autobiography written in old age. The message is always practical, timely, and clear.

¹Of the 748 titles and editions enumerated by Paul Leicester Ford in his Bibliography of Franklin (Brooklyn, 1889), nearly all indicate the immediate effects intended by his writings on politics, science, and education.

In the library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania is a rare pamphlet, containing Franklin's Proposals Relating to the Education of Youth in Pensilvania.² This paper, written more than a century and a half ago, stimulated the citizens of Philadelphia to establish an academy where the youth of the state "might receive the accomplishments of a regular education." It affords a perfect example of the practical aim and pure English which marked Franklin as an author. With liberal quotations from Latin and English essayists and poets—Cato, Milton, Locke, Addison, and Pope—with specific advice regarding the branches which should be taught, he closed the essay with this self-revelatory paragraph:

With the whole, should be constantly inculcated and cultivated that Benignity of MIND which shows itself in searching for and seizing every Opportunity to serve and to oblige; and is the Foundation of what is called GOOD BREEDING;—Ability to serve Mankind, one's Country, Friends and Family; which Ability is (with the Blessing of God) to be acquired or greatly increased by true

² Philadelphia, 1749; 32 pages and many footnotes.

8 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

Learning; and should indeed be the great Aim and End of all Learning.

Franklin did good service, during the Revolutionary period, by satiric and logical writings; but he gained his renown among his contemporaries, and is still remembered, as the foster-father of commercial thrift and literary impulse among the colonists. He was active in founding the Library Company of Philadelphia and the American Philosophical Society; he organized literary clubs and edited magazines. His travels and studies had broadened him, and given a democratic trend to his thoughts; yet he was loyal to British rule until his ideas of justice were too violently assailed. Retaining that serenity of outlook which he always urged, he became a wise supporter of American freedom, and wrote state papers and political essays in the same lucid, graceful style which had already won him a place among English authors.

The half-century from 1765 to 1815, which witnessed the birth of the new nation and its first literary expressions, may be divided into three periods, of unequal length, but of the same relative importance. There were, first, the years from occasional remonstrance against English taxation to open secession; second, those from the Declaration of Independence to the end of the Revolution; third, those from 1782 to 1815, covering the formation of government, and its assurance of life after the victories and treaty of the War of 1812. The prose and verse of the first two periods both incited and recorded the bitter feud between two countries whose bonds had been closely welded and were soon to be broken. The writers of the third, or constructive,-period were less bitter, but still intense in their zeal to crush internal anarchy and to establish a prosperous, as well as a free, nation.

The earlier writings reveal fervid emotion and strong argumentation; the later are more restrained in spirit, but the style is often crude and bombastic. The beginnings of aesthetic culture in the later Colonial decades seemed to have suffered a serious interruption. The verse of the Revolution was inspired by no devotion to the fine arts, but rather was a virile weapon for the ridicule of enemies and the encouragement of soldiers in the wearisome conflict. In the martial odes and satires by Philip Freneau, John Trumbull, Timothy Dwight, and Benjamin Prime there were occasional lyric yearnings; but they awakened meager response. The prose of the same period, including the early stages of the war, consisted of formal correspondence between Tory and Patriot leaders; heavy yet earnest state papers, like Stephen Hopkins' Rights of the Colonies, and Samuel Adams' Appeal to the World; and orations from rostrum and pulpit, by statesmen like Otis, Hancock, and Patrick Henry, and preachers like Mayhew, Chauncy, and Duffield.

As the focal point of defiance was in Boston and vicinity, with open sympathy from Virginia and Pennsylvania, the most typical literary remonstrances came from those colonies. From Pennsylvania, in addition to Franklin's familiar pamphlets,³ there issued another series of arguments that were widely read and quoted, Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies.⁴ The author of these Letters, John Dickinson, was strong in argumentation; he possessed also some literary grace. His astute mind thus framed the imminent problem of rightful taxes:

Upon the whole, the simple question is whether the parliament can legally impose duties to be paid by the people of these colonies only, FOR THE SOLE PURPOSE OF RAISING A REVENUE, on commodities which she obliges us to take from her alone, or, in other words, whether the parliament can legally take money out of our pockets, without our consent. If they can, our boasted liberty is but "Vox et preterea nihil."⁵

³ "The Causes of American Discontents" and "The Rise and Progress of the Differences between Great Britain and her American Colonies," in Bigelow's The Complete Works of Benjamin Franklin, Vol. IV, pp. 97-111; Vol. V, pp. 323-38.

⁴ Boston, Philadelphia, and London, 1768.

⁵ Letters from a Farmer, etc., Letter II, p. 14.

One minor incident of the years which preceded the war loomed large and ominous on the literary horizon—the defiant refusal to use the taxed tea. This was really symbolic of the principles involved in the later struggle; and so the prose logic contended. The verse on the theme was in forms of caustic parodies, sneering odes, and mock-heroics.⁶ They shared in popularity with the Liberty Songs, especially that by John Dickinson, written in 1768, which was parodied by the Tories, and the parody, in turn, was re-parodied by the Patriots; the three versions were sung to the stirring melody of “Hearts of Oak.” The opening stanza of Dickinson’s ode reads thus:

Come, join hand and hand, brave Americans all,
Awake through the land at fair Liberty’s call;
No tyrannous acts shall suppress our just claim,
Or stain with dishonour America’s name.

In freedom we’re born,
In freedom we’ll live:
Our purses are ready;
Steady, friends, steady;

Not as slaves but as freemen our money we’ll give.⁷

⁶In his Songs and Ballads of the Revolution (New York, 1856), Frank Moore has collected many of these droll “Ballads of Taxes and Tea.”

⁷This song was first printed anonymously in the Boston Gazette and Country Journal, July 18, 1768. It may be found, with the parodies, in Frank Moore’s Songs and Ballads of the Revolution (New York, 1856); pp. 36-47.

While the first period was one of political debate and mental indecision, the second period reflected vigorous action. Many of the pamphlets and verses called forth answering sneers and pleas from Loyalist wits. There was a tone of invective in the writings of the Whigs, not alone toward the English king, prime minister, and Parliament, but also against many honest Tories, whose noble characters have been honored by later generations, but whose scruples were scathingly denounced by their political opponents.

The Declaration of Independence was a signal for unbridled joy among the odists. Each futile scheme, and each defeat of the English leaders, gave occasion for satires by Freneau and Trumbull, or for a lampoon by Hopkinson. Versifiers composed rude, simple songs to cheer the Patriot army, like the variations of "Yankee Doodle;" or such fervent odes and hymns, sung in camps and churches, as "Columbia" by Timothy Dwight, "The American Hero" by Nathaniel Niles, and "Chester" by William Billings. Mistress Mercy Warren and Hugh Henry Brackenridge summoned a halting talent to dramatize The Battle of Bunker's Hill or to ridicule The Group of Loyalists in Boston who fawned upon Lord North and Governor Thomas Hutchinson, of Massachusetts.⁸

⁸ The Battle of Bunker's Hill: By a Gentleman of Maryland (Philadelphia, 1776); The Group (Boston, 1775).

When the war was ended, the literature was exultant and braggart for a few months. This tone was soon succeeded by one of anxiety; for many dangers threatened the new nation. Among the problems to be solved were these: how to raise money to pay the soldiers and meet the demands of the treaties; how to secure financial and industrial confidence with depreciated paper money and stagnant business; how to prevent recurrence of riots and menacing conventions of various classes in New England; how to frame a constitution, in place of the old, futile federation of the colonies, which would be acceptable to the states themselves; how to maintain the strong, personal leadership of a few men, without arousing fears of monarchical government. The force and logic in the spoken and written words of Jefferson, Hamilton, Fisher Ames, Patrick Henry, and Richard Henry Lee have given them rank among the leaders of the age both in thought and in diction. More crude, but also effective, were the lighter efforts in satire, ode, and counsel by Hopkinson and Trumbull, Humphreys, Dwight, and Alsop.

Gradually the threatened disruption of the country was prevented; in spite of vigorous opposition, the Constitution was adopted, the Bank and Mint were established, treaties of commerce were effected, the pitfall of military alliance with France was circumvented, and the various elements were converged into an embryonic republic under Washington as president. The stages by which such union was brought out of seeming confusion, and the gradual growth of confidence in the new government among all classes, especially after the naval victories of 1812-14, are revealed, with graphic impressions, in the prose and verse of the period. The establishment of industries, and the attention to education, incited some of the writers of the time to extravagant prophecies and boastful expressions; but the leaders of the nation desired an interchange of ideas and literature with the broader schools of Europe.

The war seemed to be a serious interruption to all literary activities, in the true meaning of the phrase. On the other hand, during the half-century of aesthetic barrenness and political ferment there was developed a new vital spirit, an aspiration of freedom and valor, destined to characterize American life and writings. The first verse and prose, after the war, were less refined than some of the imitative products of the later Colonial decades, but they had a deeper earnestness and an impressive assurance. A few of the authors considered in this book lived until 1830 and after—Freneau, Trumbull, Dunlap, Theodore Dwight. They had personal acquaintance with Irving, Cooper, Bryant, and the minor authors who survived to witness and contribute to our recognized literature. The struggles and undaunted hopes of the group of earlier writers encouraged those of the generation which followed to devote their lives to literature, art, and science. Irving, Cooper, Bryant, Emerson, Hawthorne, felt the influence of these earlier impulses and were able to develop into mature artistic productions many of the seeds of promise which were germinating in the previous years of political stress.

The writings of the Revolutionary and National periods were too abundant. Those which are valuable in tracing the political and literary history of America have been submerged amid the mass of ephemerides. To all the writings we apply the term "literature"—by courtesy. Moses Coit Tyler studied the authors of the Colonial and Revolutionary eras, with patient skill, in the work which remains as his monument.⁹ In a survey of this dawning literature, we must confess that it was immature as well as sincere, that the crudities of form often hide the true merit. Out of the many, a few compositions have been remembered, among them the three national songs, "Yankee Doodle," "Hail Columbia," and ⁹ History of American Literature, "The Colonial Period: 1607-1765" (2 vols.; New York, 1879); The Literary History of the American Revolution: 1763-1783 (2 vols.; New York, 1897).

“The Star-Spangled Banner.” Although the individual works of the writers of these two periods—of war and confederation—have been forgotten, and many of them deserve their oblivion, yet they may fittingly be recalled by students of early American history and literature, who will thus emphasize their influence upon the progress of national life and culture. These scattered literary efforts, from the poignant satires and the first impulse of poetry to the weak, yet haunting, products of emotional drama and fiction, were the prophetic foregleams of our national literature.

FRANCIS HOPKINSON: JURIST, WIT, AND DILETTANTE

Chapman

From a painting by R. Pine, 1785, engraved by J. B. Longacre; reproduced from National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans, 1835.

II

FRANCIS HOPKINSON: JURIST, WIT, AND DILETTANTE

The searchlight of modern investigation, turned upon American history, has clarified many events and placed a true value upon many personalities. A few characters have thus lost some of their traditional prestige, but others have won long-deferred honor. Prominent among the wits and pamphleteers of the Revolutionary decades, and the years of crisis which immediately followed, was Francis Hopkinson. He was one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, a noted judge, and a dilettante in music, painting, and verse-making. His efforts in art and literature seem crude to modern students, yet they indicate great ingenuity and a sincere desire to help forward the progress of America in culture. In writing, he had a cleverness in characterization comparable with that of Swift and Congreve, and in satire he well imitated Addison and Pope. Underneath the dilettantism were the principles of a patriot and a reformer, and the yearnings of an artist.

By inheritance he had a broad, penetrating mind and much nervous energy. His father,

Thomas Hopkinson, who had been trained in law and science in London, came to Philadelphia about 1731. Ten years later he succeeded Andrew Hamilton as judge of the Vice-Admiralty for Pennsylvania. His taste for science was recognized, and he became influential as a member of the American Philosophical Society, of which he was the first president. With Benjamin Franklin and Richard Peters, he brought into life the College of Philadelphia, where his son, Francis, was the first pupil enrolled upon the records, after the term "college" had been substituted for "academy." In his letters and in conversations, Franklin paid tribute to the practical ingenuity of the elder Hopkinson in scientific experiments, mentioning, especially, indebtedness to him for the suggestion of pointed, rather than blunted, instruments to attract the electric fluid—"the power of points to throw off electric fire."¹

The taste for music, and skill in playing both harpsichord and organ, as well as the love for poetry, which characterized Francis Hopkinson, were legacies from his mother, a woman of great industry and endowed with charm of face and mind. When his father died, leaving a large family and a small income, Francis, the eldest child, was only fourteen years old. To his education his mother devoted her personal efforts. Entering the College of Philadelphia at sixteen, he had some noted associates in that first class, graduated in 1757. Among them were Hugh Williamson, Jacob Duché, Paul Jackson, James Latta, and Samuel Magaw. Few men of his day were more brilliant than Duché, who married a sister of Hopkinson. As rector of St. Peter's and Christ Church in Philadelphia, Duché won distinction as orator, but his career was blighted by weakness of will.² When the British army entered Philadelphia, he recanted his principles of freedom, and wrote to Washington urging him to renew allegiance to the crown. Later Duché escaped with Cornwallis to London, whence he sent to Washington a pitiful appeal for permission to return to America.³

¹ The Complete Works of Benjamin Franklin (Bigelow), Vol. II, p. 211, note.

Choosing his father's profession as his own, Francis Hopkinson passed the years immediately after college in the law office of Benjamin Chew, the famous attorney-general of the Province of ² An original copy of Duché's first prayer as chaplain of the Continental Congress is in Independence Hall, Philadelphia. John Adams wrote to his wife regarding the brilliancy and promise of Duché (Letters to His Wife [1841], Vol. I, pp. 23, 24).

³ This letter and other correspondence upon the subject, including letters from Francis Hopkinson to Duché and Washington, have been edited and published by Worthington C. Ford (The Washington-Duché Letters, Brooklyn, 1890).

Pennsylvania. Hopkinson's first political experience was as secretary of the conference between the governor and the Indians of the Lehigh Valley. As a youth he won some reputation by his rhymes, written in college and soon after. One of these early efforts at versifying was "performed at the College of Philadelphia" at the commencement exercises in 1761. It was printed as "An Exercise Containing a Dialogue and Ode Sacred to the Memory of His Late Majesty George II." Hopkinson was accredited with both the words and music of the ode.⁴ The same year he gave expression to his zeal for scientific advancement in a poem, "Science," which was also published.⁵

Evidence that Hopkinson, as a youth, was strong in his allegiance to England is given by a "Dissertation" which he wrote for the prize medal offered by John Sargent, M.P., for the best essay to be written by a graduate of the College of Philadelphia upon the subject, "Reciprocal Advantages of a Perpetual Union between Great Britain and Her American Colonies." ⁶ He hoped that he might increase his small income from law and music by an appointment to some colonial office. To assist him in gaining such a position, he relied upon the influence of two men, Franklin and the bishop of Worcester, a kinsman of Mrs. Hopkinson and a friend of Lord North. Some manuscript letters show the preparatory steps taken by Hopkinson, his mother, and Franklin, to enlist the interest of the bishop of Worcester in his young relative, before Hopkinson went to London, in 1766, hoping thus to secure his appointment. A letter from Franklin to James Burrow, to be given to the bishop of Worcester, dated Craven Street, May, 1765, is quoted first:

⁴ Other early verses are to be found in manuscript in the library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. Here are two sentimental reveries, "L'Allegro, Dedicated to Benjamin Chew," and "Il Penseroso, Dedicated to Rev. Dr. Smith;" also "An Elegy Sacred to the Memory of Mrs. Ann Graeme," dated Graeme Park, July, 1765.

⁵ An interesting comment upon the piratical republication of this poem, "Science," by a Philadelphia printer, and the return to its original form with the author's revision in another edition published by Hugh Gaine, of New York, may be found in the New York Mercury, April 19, 1762, No. 507. This is reprinted in The Journals of Hugh Gaine, Printer, edited by Paul L. Ford (New York, 1902), Vol. I, p. 108.

Mrs. Hopkinson is greatly esteemed by the People of the Place, as a prudent and good woman. Her husband, Thomas Hopkinson, was in repute as a Lawyer, sometime Judge of the Admiralty Court, and one of the Governor's Council. He left her a Widow about twelve years since, with five young children, two Sons and three Daughters. These she has carefully educated, genteely but frugally, out of an Income of a small estate, and I believe without much Diminishing their Portions.

⁶ Four Dissertations on the Reciprocal Advantages of a Perpetual Union, etc. (Philadelphia, 1766). See the Bibliography.

Her eldest son, Francis, had a College education at Philadelphia, where he took his Degrees, has since read Law under the Att'y Gen'l, but still lives with his mother, and has not entered into any material Business as yet. He is a very ingenious young man and is daily growing in Esteem for his good morals and obliging Disposition.⁷

The complement of this letter is among the Franklin manuscripts in the library of the American Philosophical Society—an appreciative letter from Mrs. Hopkinson to Franklin, after she had learned of the latter's efforts to interest her relative in her behalf.⁸ The date is October 1, 1765.

A Thousand Thanks to you for the agreeable knowledge of my Relations in England and for the Trouble yourself and your Friend Mr. Burrow have been at in obtaining it—when we consider how much Business of great importance of your own you must have to transact, how must my Gratitude and my children be heightened for the uncommon Care Regularity and Exactness you have used in tracing out my Family and for the favourable character you have been pleased to give us. The Marks of Regard you are continually Shewing to the Family of a deceased Friend is to me a convincing proof of the Goodness of your Heart and I must declare that among all my Husbands former Friends I know of but one Gentleman besides Yourself who has been good enough to extend any of their Regard to his Wife and Children—and it is my sincere prayer that every kindness you have been pleased to show to me and mine may be doubled in Blessings on Yourself and Family. Shall I beg the further Favour of you to transmit the enclosed packet and Letters as directed. I send you herewith an order on Messrs. Barclay and Sons for the expense you have been at in this affair. Your good will and Trouble I cannot repay and must therefore remain

⁷ For a copy of this letter I am indebted to Mrs. Florence Scovel Shinn, a descendant of Hopkinson.

⁸ Permission to print this and the following letter was given by the librarian of the American Philosophical Society.

Your ever obliged Friend and Humble Servant,

MARY HOPKINSON

Among the letters from Hopkinson to Franklin, in the manuscript collection at the library of the American Philosophical Society, is one supplementary, in time and message, to that just quoted. After thanking Franklin for his kind recommendations, he continued in a frank manner, informing his elder friend of many matters of personal interest:

You advised me in your last to send Mr. Burrows a small present of Sturgeon or apples with a Letter of Thanks for his kindness. I did write such a Letter before I received your advice; but was so stupid that I never thought of the other;—I fear such a thing would be improper now as being so late, that it will appear to be done in Consequence of your advice & not our own free act. But I will write the best apology I can and will ship some Sturgeon for him. . . .

I visited your Family the Day before Yesterday & put Miss Sally's Harpsichord in the best Order I could but the Instrument, as to the Touch and all Machinery, is entirely ruined & I think past Recovery.—I think it would be very proper to sell this & buy her a new Harpsichord of a more simple Construction. . . .

I have finished the Translation of the Psalms of David, to the great Satisfaction of the Dutch Congregation at New York & they have paid me £145 of their Currency which I intend to keep as a Body Reserve in Case I should go to England.⁹

Franklin had left England before Hopkinson arrived there. but the young man met a cordial welcome from his kinsman, and dined with Lord North, Benjamin West, and other men of note.¹⁰ He sought in vain for a crown appointment on the Board of Commissioners of Customs for Pennsylvania. The repeal of the Stamp Act, just as he had left America, caused a bevy of Royalist office-holders to clamor for new places in the colonies, and by them the first vacant official positions were filled. His visit was not wholly fruitless, however, for two years after his return, probably through the influence of Lord North, he was appointed collector of customs at Newcastle, and was allowed a deputy for actual service. In 1774 he was appointed by the crown as a member of the Provincial Council from New Jersey.

⁹ Copies of this translation in book form are in the libraries of the New York Historical Society and the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. An exhaustive study of Hopkinson's work as musician has been made by O. G. Sonneck, in Francis Hopkinson and James Lyon (Washington, 1905).

¹⁰ Mrs. Oliver Hopkinson, of Philadelphia, has some letters which he wrote to his mother from England, with interesting details of the life at Hartleburg Castle, where he was a guest, and of the visitors there.

Various influences, during the next two years, brought about a firm renunciation of Tory allegiance, and Hopkinson joined in open sympathy with the patriot leaders. One of the first and most potent influences was his marriage to Miss Ann Borden, daughter of Judge Joseph Borden and granddaughter of the founder of the town of Bordentown, in New Jersey. The Bordens were ardent Whigs, and Hopkinson began to think and write in behalf of the colonies, even while he was a nominal servitor of the king.¹¹ He passed a part of each year in Bordentown, and the rest of the time in Philadelphia in law practice, until 1774, when he moved his residence to Bordentown. In June, 1776, he resigned as a member of the Provincial Council and was chosen to represent New Jersey at the Continental Congress. Thus he became one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence.

The three years before the Declaration of Independence were indeed critical. The hopes of relief yielded slowly to the certainty that war must decide the issue. To break away from England was a radical thought; to suggest a possible nation from the federation of scattered colonies seemed fanatical to many conservative Whigs, as well as to pronounced Tories. The history of these years, read in the contemporary newspapers, reveals the varied influences of legislators, preachers, wits, and pamphleteers.

¹¹ A graphic story of the burning of the Borden house and the patriotic defiance of Madam Borden is given in the sketch of Hopkinson by Charles R. Hildeburne, in the Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, Vol. II, p. 319.

Among the earliest and most popular satires, which ridiculed the weakness of king and Parliament, were Francis Hopkinson's A Pretty Story and A Prophecy.¹² The first was printed in September, 1774, when the Continental Congress was convened in Carpenter's Hall, Philadelphia. Hopkinson here portrayed existing conditions in America, "The New Farm," under oppressive treatment by the nobleman upon "The Old Farm." The king was represented as the exacting nobleman, Parliament was "the nobleman's wife, with avaricious eye," and "Jack" was the American colonist. Effective use was made of irony and argument, in reviewing the results of the ¹² A Pretty Story Written in the Year of Our Lord 1774 by Peter Grievous, Esq. A.B.C.D.E. Veluti in Speculo (Philadelphia, 1774); reprinted as The Old Farm and The New Farm: A Political Allegory, edited with notes by Benson J. Lossing (New York, 1857, 1864). In Hopkinson's Miscellaneous Essays, etc. (1792), Vol. I, pp. 92-97. Many of Hopkinson's early writings appeared in the Pennsylvania Magazine or American Monthly Museum (Philadelphia, 1775; edited and published by R. Aitkin).

Stamp Act, the taxed tea, and the war-vessels in Boston Harbor. The droll illustrations in the later editions emphasize the absurdity of passages, like this allegory about Lord North and Parliament:

Now the Steward had gained an entire ascendancy over the King's Wife. She no longer deliberated what would most benefit either the Old Farm or the New but said and did whatever the Steward pleased. Nay, so much was she influenced by him that she could neither utter ay or no but as he directed. For he had cunningly persuaded her that it was very fashionable for women to wear Padlocks on their Lips and that he was sure they would become her exceedingly. He therefore fastened a Padlock to each corner of her Mouth; when the one was open she could only say ay; and when the other was loos'd could only cry no. He took care to keep the keys of these locks himself; so that her will became entirely subject to his Power."

There was an abrupt and prophetic ending to this tract:

These harsh and unconstitutional proceedings irritated "Jack" and the other inhabitants to such a degree that—
COETERA DESUNT.

To encourage the sentiment of freedom and separation from England, Hopkinson wrote two clever, persuasive satires in fictional form, Letter Written by a Foreigner on the Character of the

"A Pretty Story (1774), pp. 65-91, in Hopkinson's Miscellaneous Essays; edition of 1857, in The Old Farm and the New Farm, p. 31.

English Nation and A Prophecy. The former was calm and philosophical in tone: the observations of a supposed visitor in England in 1776, who was amazed and grieved at the signs of decadence and provincialism, and above all at the obstinacy of the king and his ministers; for they "have quarrelled with their loyal and beneficial subjects" in America "because the latter will not acknowledge that two and two make five." A Prophecy was an answer to Letters of Cato to the People of Pennsylvania, which had been widely circulated among the Tory newspapers; they were earnest and forceful in their counsels against any secession of the colonies from the motherland.¹⁴ This second allegory, like the first, suggested in form Arbuthnot's History of John Bull, and abounded in sentences of humor and mock-heroic. It was expressed in the phraseology of an old-time prophet, who deplored the controversial scenes in his vision, but declared for success to the cause of independence.

Under the imagery of a tree, fruitful for many years, planted in a far-away country by the king of many islands, Hopkinson described the growth of the American colonies and the benefits which they had brought to England. But, he added, "the North Wind blasted the Tree and broke its Branches." The prophet was introduced, with evident reference to Franklin; "and he shall wear spectacles upon his nose and reverence and esteem shall rest upon his brow." Then follows the advice of the prophet, that the old tree shall be hewn down, and a new, vigorous, young tree be substituted. This shall be defended against the winds of the North by a high wall. And they shall dress it and prune it, and cultivate it to their liking. And the young tree shall grow and flourish and spread its branches far abroad; and the people shall dwell under the shadow of its branches, and shall become an exceeding great, and powerful and happy nation.¹⁸

¹⁴ These Letters expressed the fears and protests of Rev. William Smith, provost of the College of Philadelphia, an earlier friend of Hopkinson, and one of the most able and persuasive of the Tory pamphleteers. The Translation of a Letter of a Foreigner, etc., is in Hopkinson's Miscellaneous Essays, etc. (1792), Vol. I, pp. 98-110.

During the war Hopkinson's zeal for his country was expressed by service on committees for practical work, as well as by his writings. As one of three commissioners, under direction of the Marine Committee, he assisted in the work of equipping the navy; he was also treasurer of the Continental Loan Office for New Jersey. Franklin did not lose his interest in Hopkinson's career, as is indicated by letters from France, praising Hopkinson's "political squibs" and urging him to write more, offering him "gim-cracks" for scientific use, and congratulating him on his treasury office.¹⁶ In return, Hopkinson both solicited and appreciated the fatherly interest of Franklin; in testimony, there is a manuscript letter, in the library of the American Philosophical Society, which contains some side-lights upon military affairs and the varied pursuits of Hopkinson:

¹⁸ This Prophecy is in Miscellaneous Essays, Vol. I, pp. 92-97.

Phila. 22d Octr. 1778

My dear Friend,

Had I consulted my own Inclinations more than your Ease, you should have frequently heard from me since you left us; but knowing your Correspondence to be extensive & your Engagements important, I have avoided offering myself to your Notice, lest I should intrude on more Weighty Concerns. I would not, however, carry Delicacy so far as to run the Hazard of being entirely forgot by one who was my Father's Friend to the last & whom I am very proud to call mine, a continuance of your Regard will be a real Gratification to me & flatter my Vanity, as I can truly say I both love & honour you.—I have suffered much by the Invasion of the Goths & Vandals. I was obliged to fly from my House at Borden Town with my Family & leave all my effects in statu quo, the Savages plundered me to their Heart's Content—but I do not repine, as I really esteem it an honour to have suffered in my Country's cause & in Support of the Rights of Human Nature & of civilized Society. I have not abilities to assist our righteous Cause by personal Prowess & Force of Arms, but I have done it all the service I could with my Pen. Throwing in my wits at Times in Prose & Verse, serious & satirical essays &c. The Congress have been pleased to appoint me Treasurer of Loans, for the United States with a salary of 2000 Dollars. Could our money recover its former Value, I should think this a handsome appointment—as it is, it is a Subsistence.

¹⁶ The Complete Works of Benjamin Franklin (Bigelow), Vol. VI, pp. 421, 422; Vol. VII, p. 294.

Mrs. Bache has been so good as to lend me your portable electrical apparatus, which I have got in excellent order, & shall take great Care of; it is a great Amusement to me & I hope you will not be offended with her & me for this Liberty. I wish to borrow also your little Air Pump which is at present much out of Order but I will clean it and put it to Rights if she will let me have it. Whatever she lends me shall be punctually restored on Demand, in good Repair. N. B. Your Gim-cracks have suffered much by the late usurpers of our City.

But I will not detain you longer with my Uninteresting Chat. Sincerely wishing you a long Continuance of Health & Ease, & all the solid Comforts which a good Man enjoys in the decline of Life,

I am, dear Sir,

Your ever affectionate & unfeigned Friend,

FRA^S HOPKINSON

Another evidence of popular esteem came to Hopkinson when he was appointed, in 1779, as judge of the Court of the Admiralty. He held this position for ten years, when he was made district judge by appointment of Washington.¹⁷ As lawyer and judge he was astute and liberal;

¹⁷ Letter of appointment in possession of Mrs. Oliver Hopkinson.

his decisions were cited with respect by later jurists. Apparently he was once the victim of enmity, and was charged and impeached for accepting bribes, gifts, etc., during the first year of his judgeship.¹⁸ He was acquitted, and this forgotten episode left no stain upon his reputation for integrity and efficiency. Four years later Jefferson recommended him as director of the mint, with this characterization: "a man of genius, gentility, and great merit—as capable of the office as any man I know and the appointment would give general pleasure because he is generally esteemed."¹⁹

That the lucrative directorship did not come to him unsought is shown by a letter from him in the Jefferson Papers, in manuscript, now in the Library of Congress.²⁰ The letter was dated Philadelphia, May 12, 1784:

It appears by your Letter that Congress have again taken up the Idea of a public Mint. I beg leave to mention to you that I have long had it in Contemplation to solicit the super-Intendency of this Department should it ever be established. Mr. Morris marked out this Station for me when he first formed the Idea of striking metal Coin for the U. States. My Gim-crack Abilities & I flatter myself my Integrity & Attention would be of Service in the Department—but my whole Scheme would fail unless this Mint should be carried on in or near this city. The Business of the Admiralty Department takes up but little of my Time, & its Emoluments (£500 per An) which is the whole of my Income, you may easily suppose to be insufficient for the Support & Education of so large a Family as I have in Charge. What with the Depredations of the enemy & my little Capital which lies entrapped (?) in the Movement of the Public Funds—I have given up all hope of leaving my Family anything of Importance at my Death, but my earnest Desire is to be enabled to leave them well educated—to do which I must procure in some line or other, a more liberal Income than £500 per an. This I cannot do in the way of Trade; my office as Judge prohibits it—at least not openly—but there will be no Inconsistence, in my holding such a Department under Congress.

¹⁸ For an account of "The Impeachment and Trial of Francis Hopkinson, Judge of the Admiralty, November, 1780," see Pennsylvania State Trials (edited by Edmund Hogan), Vol. I (Philadelphia, 1794).

¹⁹ The Writings of Thomas Jefferson, edited by Paul Leicester Ford, Vol. III, p. 495.

²⁰ Jefferson Papers, in manuscript, Series II, Vol. XL, No. 27.

A few months before writing this letter, Hopkinson had written to Jefferson, then in Paris, asking the privilege of correspondence with him, that he might express his literary and scientific fancies to one who would give appreciative response:

I shall be happy to correspond with you, if you give me any Encouragement. My Fancy suggests a Thousand Whims which die for Want of Communication—nor would I communicate them but to one who has Discernment to conceive my Humour, and Candour with respect to my Faults & Peculiarities. Such a Friend I believe you to be.²¹

Evidently he received the wished-for encouragement, as he wrote freely to Jefferson during the next five years, of his varied inventions and hopes for success with them. Thus, in December, 1785, he recounts: "I have contrived a method of assisting a vessel in her sailing which promises great Success—it is simple, trifling in Point of expence & demonstrable in Theory. The Experiment has not yet been tried, but will be before long."²² In April, 1787, he wrote: "I have invented this Winter a cheap, convenient & useful Appendage to a common Candle-stick, which keeps the Flames from being flared by the Wind in Summer or the Fire in Winter."²³ A year later he announced to Jefferson his plan to establish "a Wax Chandlery" in Philadelphia, if he can get some gentlemen to join in his plan.²⁴ Another invention was of a musical kind: "In the course of my Experiments I discover'd a method of drawing the Tone from Metal Balls by Friction—to an amazing Perfec-

²¹ Jefferson Papers, MS. (Library of Congress), Series II, Vol. XL, No. 24.

²² Jefferson Papers, loc. cit., No. 3. This plan was outlined in his Miscellaneous Essays, Vol. I, pp. 274-285.

²³ Ibid., No. 40. The model of this candle-case is in the American Philosophical Society.

²⁴ Ibid., No. 41.

tion.—I am getting a Set of Bells cast & expect to introduce a new musical Instrument to be called the Bellarmonic.”²⁵

Hopkinson's legal and scientific activities made far less impression upon the people of his own day than was achieved by his writings, with their peculiar cleverness and logical force. It is very difficult for us today to measure the potent influence of the writers of the Revolutionary and National periods on their contemporaries. Their products seem amusing, rather than forceful, when taken away from their context and natural environment. Many of Hopkinson's compositions were ephemeral, yet they served a purpose of more lasting importance than the issue of the hour seemed to indicate; others possess some literary merit in logical force and satire. Among the latter may be mentioned Letter to Lord Howe, after the devastating march of the British troops through New Jersey; John Burgoyne's Proclamation, and the strictures upon the Tory printers, James Rivington and Hugh Gaine.²⁶ Many of ²⁵ Ibid., No. 37.

²⁶ Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings (1792), Vol. I, pp. 121-26, 146-50. In Two Letters (Vol. I, pp. 132-45) he hurled invective against the “innumerable lies from the batteries of Rivington and Gaine.” This was followed by a clever lampoon, a mock advertisement of the books, maps, etc., of Rivington, who, after the surrender of Cornwallis, found it was “convenient for the subscriber to remove to Europe” (Miscellaneous Essays, etc., Vol. I, pp. 159-69).

his tracts and lampoons were first published in the Pennsylvania Packet, under the pseudonyms of "Calamus," "Cautious," "Calumniator," "A. B.," "One of the People," and occasionally, "F.H."²⁷ In their original form, as read in this paper, some of the attacks are truly Rabellaisian; we easily believe the statement of his family that, in revising his writings for publication, he modified the vehemence of many phrases.²⁸

His war-verses were intended to inspire the soldiers in days of gloom; and they accomplished that purpose. Among popular odes was the "Camp Ballad," which was well adapted to a marching-song:

To arms, then, to arms! 'Tis fair freedom invites us;
The trumpet shrill sounding, to battle excites us;

²⁷ Examples of this style are as follows: "Calamus" in Packet, February 9, 1782: "A Parody on a Scene in Macbeth" by "Calumniator," Packet, April 2, 1782; a dignified remonstrance, by "A Lover of Candour," Packet, June 15, 1782.

²⁸ In manuscript volumes owned by Mrs. Florence Scovel Shinn, a descendant of Hopkinson, are some scathing satires and doggerel songs like this complaint of the Tory leaders and printers:

Burgoyne with thousand came
In hopes of Wealth and Fame
What hath he done?
At Saratoga he Had the Disgrace to see
Each soldier manfully
Lay down his Gun.

The banners of virtue unfurled shall wave o'er us,
Our heroes lead on, and the foe fly before us.

The single composition by Francis Hopkinson which has been generally recalled was one of his most unliterary efforts, a mere jeu d'esprit—"Battle of the Kegs." The incident which he has preserved in memory by his verses illustrated Yankee ingenuity, and would make a strong appeal to a man of Hopkinson's tastes and sense of humor. A device by David Bushnell of some amateur torpedoes, known as the "American turtles," was the germ of the incident and song. Several of these torpedoes were floated down the Delaware in the late autumn of 1777, to annoy the British soldiers by causing explosions among the boats. The actual facts are given in different versions, but the incident, as well as Hopkinson's verses,²⁹ have been mentioned in several records of the period. Without much question, the mock-heroic narrative, in prose, which was printed in the New Jersey Gazette, January 28, 1778, was written by Hopkinson, as a preface to his verses. He thus ridiculed the effects of the kegs upon the British soldiers :

²⁹ Explanation of this invention is given fully in James Thacher's Military Journal during the American Revolutionary War, etc. (Boston, 1823), pp. 75, 76, 146-50; Appendix, pp. 452, 453. On p. 244, date July 10, 1780, he refers to an evening in camp when "we were delighted with the song composed by Mr. Hopkinson, called the Battle of the Kegs, sung in the best style by a number of gentlemen." For other accounts see Pennsylvania Ledger, February 11, 1778, American Philosophical Transactions, Vol. IV, p. 312.

Some asserted that these kegs were filled with armed rebels, who were to issue forth, in the dead of night, as the Grecians did of old from the wooden horse at the siege of Troy and take the city by surprise; declaring that they had seen the points of bayonets sticking out of the bung-holes of the kegs. Others said that they were filled with inveterate combustibles, which would set the whole Delaware in flames and consume all the shipping in the harbor. Whilst others conjectured that they were machines constructed by a magic, and expected to see them mount the wharves and roll, all flaming with infernal fire, through the streets of the city.

After an ironical recital of the attack upon the kegs "by land and marine forces," the caricature closed with this sentence of sarcasm :

It is said His Excellency, Lord Howe, has despatched a swift-sailing packet, with an account of his signal victory to the court of London. In short, Monday the—day of January, 1778, will be ever memorable in history for the renowned Battle of the Kegs.

This briery satire in prose was followed probably within a few months, by the rollicking stanzas, adapted to the tune of "Moggy Lawder," and the jolly raillery was sung and recited throughout the colonies. The verses have no true literary merit, but it cannot be denied that they have swing and effectiveness. The opening stanzas are typical of the form :

BATTLE OF THE KEGS.

GALLANTS attend, and hear a friend,
Trill forth harmonious ditty :
Strange things I'll tell, which late befel
In Philadelphia city.

'Twas early day, as poets say,
Just when the sun was rising,
A soldier stood, on log of wood,
And saw a sight surprizing.
As in a maze, he stood to gaze,
The truth can't be deny'd, fir,
He spy'd a score—of kegs, or more,
Come floating down the tide, fir.
A sailor too, in jerkin blue,
The strange appearance viewing,
First damn'd his eyes, in great surprize,
Then said some mischief brewing.
These kegs now hold the rebels bold,
Pack'd up like pickled herring ;
And they're come down t' attack the town,
In this new way of ferrying.
The souldier flew, the sailor too,
And, fear'd almost to death, fir,
Wore out their shoes, to spread the news,
And ran till out of breath, fir.
Now up and down, throughout the town,
Most frantic scenes were acted :
And some ran here, and some ran there
Like men almost distracted.
Some fire cry'd, which some deny'd,
But said the earth had quaked ;
And girls and boys, with hideous noise,
Ran through the town half naked.
Sir William he, snag as a flea,
Lay all this time a snoring.
Nor dreamt of harm, as he lay warm
In bed with Mrs. L.—, fir.
Now in affright, he starts upright,
Awak'd by such a clatter :
He rubs both eyes, and boldly cries,
" For God's sake what's the matter ?"
At his bed side, he then spy'd
Sir Erskine at command, fir,

Upon one foot he had one boot,
And t' other in his hand, fir.
The rebels—more's the pity—
Without a boat, are all on float,
And rang'd before the city.
The motley crew, in vessels new,
With tatan for their guide, fir,
Pack'd up in bags, or wooden kegs,
Come driving down the tide, fir.
Therefore prepare for bloody war ;
These kegs must all be routed ;
Or surely we despis'd shall be,
And British courage doubted ;
The royal band now ready stand,
All rang'd in dread array, fir.
With stomach stout, to see it out,
And make a bloody day, fir.
The cannons roar, from shore to shore ;
The small arms make a rattle :
Since wars began, I'm sure no man
E'er saw so strange a battle.
The sith below swam to and fro,
Attack'd from ev'ry quarter ;
Why fare, thought they, the devils to pay ?
'Monght folks above the water.
These kegs, 'tis said, tho' strongly made,
Of rebel slaves and hoops, fir,
Could not oppose their pow'ful foes,
The conqu'ring British troops, fir.
From morn to night, their men of might Display'd amazing courage ;
and when the sun was fairly down,
Retir'd to sup their porridge :
an hundred men with each a pen,
Or more upon my word, fir,
It is most true, would be too few,
Their valour to record, fir.
Such feats did they perform that day
Upon these wicked kegs, fir,
That years to come, if they get home,
They'll make their boasts and brags, fir.

From an undated ballad-broadside, in American Antiquarian Society Library.

Gallants, attend, and hear a friend
 Trill forth harmonious ditty;
 Strange things I'll tell which late befell
 In Philadelphia city.

'Twas early day, as poets say,
 Just when the sun was rising,
 A soldier stood on a log of wood
 And saw a thing surprising.

A sailor too, in jerkin blue,
 This strange appearance viewing,
 First rubb'd his eyes, in great surprise
 Then said—"some mischief's brewing;

"These kegs, I'm told, the rebels hold,
 Packed up like pickled herring;
 And they've come down t' attack the town,
 In this new way of ferrying"⁸⁰

As an example of Hopkinson's more dignified method of writing, one may choose the tract, A Political Catechism, written after Washington's successful raid at Trenton and the apparent collapse of the British commanders. Contrasting the pampered Royalists with the American general, he extolled Washington in terms of hero-worship:

⁸⁰ This ballad appeared in the Pennsylvania Packet, March 4, 1778; its first printing was in 1779 by B. Towne, Philadelphia (see Hildeburne's Issues of the Press of Pennsylvania, 1885-86, Vol. II. p. 336). A broadside here photographed is in the American Antiquarian Society. The ballad is in Hopkinson's Miscellaneous Essays, etc., Vol. III, p. 169. An edition was printed in 1866 by the Oakwood Press.

To him the title of Excellency is applied with peculiar propriety. He is the best and greatest man the world ever knew. He retreats like a General and attacks like a Hero. Had he lived in the days of idolatry, he had been worshipped as a god. One age cannot do justice to his merit; but a grateful posterity shall, for a succession of ages, remember the great Deliverer of his country.³¹

The devotion of Hopkinson to Washington did not seem to be incited by hope of reward. It was the fervent expression of his nature, and is akin to many other tributes by ardent Federalists of that age, but in marked contrast to the anathemas heaped upon Washington and his friends by political opponents. Hopkinson considered Washington as a personal friend and patron of the arts in which he delighted. When he published a volume of his songs, with music, he dedicated the folio to Washington, in terms of intimate friendship.³² After a reference to the sympathy between them, he said:

With respect to this little Work, which I now have the honour to present to your Notice, I can only say that it is such as a Lover, not a Master of the Arts, can furnish. I am neither a profess'd Poet nor a profess'd Musician; and yet venture to appear in those characters united; for which, I confess, the censure of Temerity may justly be brought against me. . . . However small the ³¹ Miscellaneous Essays, etc., Vol. I, p. 119.

³² Seven Songs for the Harpsichord or Forte Piano. The Words and Music composed by Francis Hopkinson (Philadelphia, [1788]).

Reputation may be that I shall derive from this Work, I cannot, I believe, be refused the Credit of being the first Native of the United States who has produced a Musical Composition. If this attempt should not be too severely treated, others may be encouraged to enter on a path, yet untrodden in America, and the Arts in succession will take root and flourish amongst us.

In accepting the dedication and flattering letter which came with it, Washington deplored his own musical inability, but said, with kindly humor:

I can neither sing one of the songs, nor raise a single note on any instrument to convince the unbelieving. But I have, however, one argument which will prevail with persons of true taste (at least in America)—I can tell them that *it is the production of Mr. Hopkinson.*²³

To Jefferson, or his daughter, Hopkinson sent a copy of this songbook, with special mention of the pathos of the last number and the circumstances of its writing. He explained that the songs were composed originally for his daughters, who play and sing them well. The last Song, if play'd very slow, and sang with expression, is forcibly pathetic—at least in my Fancy. Both Words and Music were the Work of an hour in the Height of a Storm. But the Imagination of an Author who composes from his Heart, rather than his Head, is always more heated than he can expect his Readers to be.²⁴

²³ Manuscript letter owned by Mrs. Oliver Hopkinson.

²⁴ Jefferson Papers, MS. Series II, Vol. XL, No. 43. This last, "pathetic" song is quoted in part below.

In reply, Jefferson assured his friend of appreciation, and pictured his family of daughters enjoying the music upon the harpsichord, while the youngest girl was "all in tears. I asked her if she was sick? She said, no; but the tune was so mournful."⁸⁵ Evidently this tribute was agreeable to Hopkinson, and writers of his age, as a compliment to their skill in cultivating sentimentality.

These seven songs, examined today, show limited musical skill, but they were popular far into the last century. Such songs as "With Jemmy on the Sea" and the rhythmic "Hunting-Call" are not yet forgotten by singers of the older generation. The sentimental swain, the blushing maiden, and the weeping-willow in the background, which furnish the setting for the songs, were familiar features of tales, verses, and samplers of that period. The most poetic of the verses is the seventh love-song, suggestive of Henry Vaughan or Robert Herrick in an occasional stanza. The song bore the title "My Generous Heart Disdains."

Still uncertain is tomorrow,
 Not quite certain is today;
 Shall I waste my time in sorrow?
 Shall I languish life away?
 All because a cruel maid
 Hath not Love with Love repaid?

⁸⁵ Jefferson Papers, MS. Series I, Vol. III, No. 280.

In the political agitation which preceded the adoption of the Constitution by Pennsylvania, Virginia, and New York, Hopkinson took a prominent part through newspaper articles, urging the need of a new declaration of federation for the states. He was one of the most urgent Federalists, although he died before the bitter contests of opinion between the Federalists and Anti-Federalists after the election of Washington as president. He challenged Jefferson regarding his attitude toward the Federal party, as is indicated by a letter from Jefferson to Hopkinson.⁸⁶ In view of the later position of Jefferson as leader of the Democratic-Republican party, and his suspected alliance with Freneau in editing the most aggressive Anti-Federalist newspaper of the times,⁸⁷ this letter has a peculiar interest to modern students. Under date of Paris, March 13, 1789, Jefferson wrote:

You say that I have been dished up to you as an anti-federalist and ask me if it be just,—my opinion was never worthy enough of notice to merit citing, but since you ask it I will give it you.

I am not a Federalist, because I never submitted the whole system of my opinions to the creed of any party of men whatever in religion, in philosophy, in politics, or in anything else, where I was capable of thinking for myself, such an addiction is the last degradation of a free and moral agent; if I could not go to heaven but with a party, I would not go there at all, therefore I protest to you I am not of the party of the federalists, but I am much farther from that of the Antifederalists. I approved, from the first moment, of the great mass of what is in the new constitution, the consolidation of the government, the organization into Executive, legislative and judicial, . . . the happy compromise of interests between the great and little states by the different manner of voting in the different houses, the voting by persons instead of states, the qualified negative of laws given to the Executive which however, I should have liked better if associated with the judiciary as in New York, and the power of taxation. . . . What I disapproved from the first moment was the want of a bill of rights to guard liberty against the legislative as well as executive branches of the government. . . . I disapproved also the perpetual reeligibility of the President.

⁸⁶ Ibid. Series I, Vol III, No. 280. Also Jefferson's Writings (Ford) Vol. V, pp. 75-78.

⁸⁷ National Gazette, Philadelphia, October, 1791, to October, 1793.

About a year before this declaration of sentiments by Jefferson, Hopkinson had written to him frankly of the controversy, especially in Pennsylvania, over the new Constitution, and had referred to his own literary services in the movement. He announced that Philadelphia was "in a high political Fermentation about our new proposed federal Constitution," and added:

You will be surprised when I tell you that our public newspapers have announced General Washington to be a Fool influenced & led by that Knave Dr. Franklin who is a public Defaulter for Millions of Dollars, that Mr. Morris has defrauded the Public out of as many Millions as you please & that they are to cover their frauds by this new Government. . . .

I had the Luck to discover & bring forward into public View on sufficient Testimony the writer of a Series of abominable abuse, under the Signature Philadelphiensis, he is an Irishman who came from Dublin about 3 years ago & got admitted as Tutor in Arithmetic in our University.²⁸ I am now under the Lash for this Discovery, scarce a Day's papers without my appearance in the newspaper in every scandalous Garb that scribbling Vengeance can furnish. I wrote also a piece stiled The New Roof which had a great Run. I would send you a copy but for the Postage. You will probably see it in some of the Papers, as it was reprinted in, I believe, every State.²⁹

The New Roof was another clever allegory, with blended prose and verse. It was vigorous as an argument for the new Constitution versus the futile Confederation, with its defunct powers. In New York, Virginia, and Massachusetts the tract was read and quoted by Federal leaders, while it caught popular fancy by its symbolic form. In behalf of a new Constitution Hopkinson argued thus:

1. That the whole fabric was too weak. 2. That there were indeed thirteen rafters; but that these rafters were not connected by any braces or ties, so as to form a union of strength. 3. That some of these rafters were too thick and heavy, and others too slight; and as the whole had been put together whilst the timber was yet green, some had warped outwards, and of course sustained an undue proportion of weight, while others, warping inwards, had shrunk from bearing any weight at all. 4. That the roof was so flat as to admit the most idle servants in the family, their playmates and acquaintances to trample upon and abuse it.*

²⁸ Many articles, thus signed, were in The Freeman's Journal, Philadelphia, during the fall of 1787. See attack on Hopkinson as "the little Fiddler" in The Independent Gazetteer, March 24, 1788, Centinel, No. XVII.

²⁹ Jefferson Papers, MS. series II, Vol. XL, No. 41.

With scathing wit, Hopkinson portrayed the leaders of the opposition to the "new roof," as the articles of agreement were generally called. He extolled James, the surveyor of the old roof—presumably James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, who had been chosen "as architect to look over the repairs;" and he caricatured such opponents as William Patterson, of New Jersey; Governor George Clinton, of New York; Robert Whitehill, and John Dickinson, of Pennsylvania. This is a typical passage of satire:

Now there was an old woman, known by the name of Margery, who had got a comfortable apartment in the mansion house. This woman was of an intriguing spirit, of a restless and inveterate temper, fond of tattle and a great mischief-maker. . . . It so happened that in the construction of the new roof, her apartment would be considerably lessened. No Sooner, therefore, did she hear of the plan proposed by the architects, but she put on her old red cloak, and was day and night trudging amongst the tenants and servants and crying out against the new roof and the framers of it. Amongst these she had selected William, Jack and Robert, three of the tenants, and instigated them to oppose the plan in agitation; she caused them to be sent to the great hall on the day of debate, and furnished them with innumerable alarms and fears, cunning arguments, and specious objections.

* In the Pennsylvania Packet, December 29, 1787, is the prose part of The New Roof, unsigned, but prefaced by the words "For the Packet."

The song which closed this allegory was effective and rhythmic:

Up! Up! with the rafters; each frame is a state:
How nobly they rise! their span, too, how great!
From the north to the south, o'er the whole they extend,
And rest on the walls whilst the walls they defend:
For our roof we will raise, and our song still shall be,
Combined in strength, yet as citizens free.⁴¹

If such allegorical methods seem puerile to this critical age, we must remember that their simplicity, with their wit, made them far more effective among the people of the earlier time than any more subtle method would have been. In a letter from Robert Morris to Hopkinson, dated from Williamsburg, in 1788, is a direct allusion to the general interest awakened by this argument in unique form:⁴²

⁴¹ The Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings of Francis Hopkinson, Vol. II, pp. 282-319. By a mistake, the date here is 1778, not 1787.

⁴² From a manuscript letter owned and loaned by Mrs. Oliver Hopkinson.

I received your obliging letter before my departure from Richmond and had much pleasure not only in reading "The New Roof" but also in communicating it to others; it is greatly admired & I tell them if they could but enter into the Dramatis Personae as we do they would find it still more excellent. The character of Margery is well hit off, how does the old Lady like it? I am not surprised that they should baste you in the Freeman's Journal, it is what you must expect as long as they have anybody to Wield a Pen. I observe they will not let me alone, altho no author. It is my fate to furnish matter for reproach whether I meddle or do not meddle in Politics, my successes & my misfortunes, whichever befall me, are equally the themes for abuse. However let them indulge their spleen—if I had nothing else to disturb my repose, I should sleep much at ease.

My Wythe yesterday at Dinner introduced the New Roof as a subject and after expressing his approbation. very modestly supposed it to be one of your productions. Mr. G. Morris & myself joined in that opinion. Thus you see that whether you intend it or not, there always appear some characteristic marks in your writings that disclose the Fountain from whence they spring.

As an example of the extravagant tribute paid to Hopkinson by his friends, here is a sentence in another letter by Morris, of later date :

You are either a great Wit or Humorist, you have Superior Genius or you have great Talents or rather I shall come nearer the Truth by charging you with being the actual possessor of all these qualities.⁴⁸

⁴⁸ From a manuscript letter owned by Mrs. Oliver Hopkinson.

This influence of Hopkinson among men of affairs was won in spite of very small stature and a weak presence. The familiar description of him, given by John Adams, has remained as a mistaken impression of his true personality.⁴⁴ After meeting him at the studio of Mr. Peale in 1776, Adams wrote to his wife:

I have a curiosity to penetrate a little deeper into the bosom of this curious gentleman, and may possibly give you some more particulars concerning him. He is one of your pretty, little, curious, ingenious men. His head is not bigger than a large apple, less than our friend Pemberton or Dr. Simon Tufts. I have not met with anything in natural history more amusing and entertaining than his personal appearance—yet he is genteel and well bred and very social.

Mingled with the delicate traits of Hopkinson were strength of mind and patience.⁴⁵ In circles of politics, education, and society his wit and geniality made him welcome. His touch was gentle, but beneath was a sting of ridicule which hurt his enemies more than the bolder satires of his contemporaries. His zeal for reform showed itself in clever essays upon education and allied themes. Under the favorite signature of "Calamus" he remonstrated against the scandalous trend of journalism at the close of the war, and contended:

⁴⁴ Letters of John Adams Addressed to His Wife (Boston, 1841), Vol. I, pp. 156, 157.

⁴⁵ As illustration of his gentleness was a popular story of a mouse which came forth daily to share his meals, and a flock of tame pigeons which greeted him (Delaplaine's Repository of the Lives and Portraits of Distinguished American Characters, Vol. III, p. 138).

Having observed with real concern, that our newspapers have for a long time past, been filled with private calumny to the great abuse of the liberty of the press and dishonor of the city,—I, who have ever been ambitious of devising something for the public good, set my wits to work to remedy this growing evil and to restore our gazettes, advertisers, journals and packets to their original design—viz., to make them the vehicles of Intelligence not the common sewers of scandal.

Following this statement was an outline of a proposed plan for a "High Court of Honor" to decide cases of scandal and calumny.⁴⁶

On the occasion of a petty quarrel between two bands of medical students and their respective schools in Philadelphia, Hopkinson addressed to the classes An Oration, so full of ridicule and good sense that it silenced the wranglers.⁴⁷ Another effective remonstrance, in satire form was, Dialogues of the Dead,⁴⁸ directed against the filth and carcasses of animals which were allowed ⁴⁶ Miscellaneous Essays, etc., Vol. I, pp. 151-58.

⁴⁷ An Oration Which Might Have Been Delivered to the Students in Anatomy on the Late Rupture between the Two Schools in this City (1789).

⁴⁸ Miscellaneous Essays, Vol. I, pp. 327-39. This is referred to by MacMaster in A History of the People of the United States (1883), Vol. I, p. 64, note.

to putrify in the streets of Philadelphia. Among the tributes to Hopkinson's memory were some crude stanzas by John Swanwick, which are of interest because they record another occasion when Hopkinson by his pen gained a victory for civic betterment. In apostrophe his elegist wrote:

Sweet spring advance, and deck with flow'rets gay,
The tomb where Hopkinson's remains are laid:
Ye Muses, there your constant vigils pay,
And guard from ills the consecrated shade.

Ye city trees, protect your patron's grave;
He once from ruin saved your leafy charms,
Then to his honor bid your green tops wave,
And fold his urn in your embracing arms.*

The allusion in these verses was to a plea by Hopkinson, in the Pennsylvania Gazette, in 1782, which was successful in rescinding a vote of the city government, declaring that all the city trees should be cut down for fear of contagion and fire. This was entitled A Speech of a Standing Member, the Plea of Citizen Tree. It was not alone witty, but it also showed much information regarding moisture and sanitation.

When the grand federal procession was held in Philadelphia, in July, 1788, to celebrate the adoption of the Constitution and the confidence of the people, Hopkinson was chairman of the committee of arrangements and has left a graphic account of the celebration.⁵⁰

* The American Museum (Carey), Vol. IX, p. 38, Appendix (1792).

By such spirited attacks upon abuses of various kinds, which retarded true progress, Hopkinson often created a tide of disfavor against them. He was an earnest student of the then known sciences, and a fearless critic of the stale, scholastic methods of teaching them. Like John Trumbull in Progress of Dulness, he burlesqued the formal, lifeless recitations, in a satirical essay, Modern Learning Exemplified by a Specimen of a Collegiate Examination.⁵¹ He ridiculed the stilted modes of teaching metaphysics, logic, natural philosophy, mathematics, anatomy, and "the Practice of Physic and Chemistry." A brief portion from this burlesque on examinations of his day is the following:

Professor. "What is the salt called with respect to the box?"

Student. "It is called its Contents."

Professor. "And Why so?"

Student. "Because the cook is content, quoad hoc, to find plenty of salt in the box."

Professor. "You are quite right. Let us now proceed to Logic. How many parts are there in a salt-box?"

⁵⁰ The account of this celebration is in Miscellaneous Essays, etc., Vol. II, pp. 349-422. The gold anchor worn by Hopkinson in his hat is in the collection of federal relics in Independence Hall, Philadelphia.

⁵¹ American Museum, February, 1787, pp. 142-47.

Student. "Three,—bottom, top, and sides."

Professor. "How many modes are there in a salt-box?"

Student. "Four,—the formal, the substantial, the accidental and the topsy turvy."²⁸

Hopkinson had many schemes for improving the teaching of sciences. Not a few of his ideas seem only predictions of the experimental modes of today, the natural and practical way of teaching science. He had a well-trained mind, and his odd conceits showed a marked degree of ingenuity. When the British troops devastated Bordentown, Hopkinson's house was saved by an incident which attests his scholarship. The torch had been applied to the outside of the house, when the captain of the Hessians, Ewald, seeking for plunder probably, entered the library and was amazed at the books, the scientific apparatus, and the mechanical designs. As he had an interest in science, he respected such evidences of scholarship and gave command that the flames should be extinguished. Within a volume of Provost Smith's Discourses he wrote, beneath his own seal, "This man was one of the greatest rebels, nevertheless, if we dare to conclude from the Library and Mechanical and Mathematical instruments, he must have been a very learned man."²⁸

²⁸*Miscellaneous Essays, etc.*, Vol. I, p. 344.

²⁸*Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography*, Vol. II, p. 320.

Not all of Hopkinson's literary skits and essays were so purposeful and serious as those that have been cited. He turned his wit into a merry channel when he wrote the droll impressions, in a letter from a gentleman in Philadelphia to his friend in Europe, On Annual White-Washings. This custom of the past days was cleverly described and parodied, as a part of the marriage contract, giving to the young wife "the free and unmolested exercise of the rights of white-washing, with all its ceremonials, privileges and appurtenances." In the same essay Hopkinson commemorated, with mingled respect and humor, another and more lasting custom of his native city:

There is also another custom peculiar to the city of Philadelphia and nearly allied to the former. I mean that of washing the pavement before the doors every Saturday evening. I at first took this to be a regulation of the police, but, on further enquiry, find it is a religious rite preparatory to the Sabbath and is, I believe, the only religious rite in which the numerous sectaries of this city perfectly agree.⁵⁴

Francis Hopkinson died of apoplexy, in May, 1791, and was buried in Christ Churchyard, although the tomb cannot now be identified.⁵⁵

⁵⁴ American Museum, January, 1787, pp. 48-53; Miscellaneous Essays, etc., Vol. II, pp. 146-60.

⁵⁵ His burial record, May 11, 1791, may be found in the manuscript list of burials of Christ Churchyard, to be found in the Library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

Both Bordentown and Philadelphia contain memorials of him. Much of his later life was passed in the latter city. The Hopkinson mansion still stands in Bordentown, slightly changed in appearance from his day. It is linked in memory with his son, Joseph, as well as with the elder man. Here Francis Hopkinson delighted to return for rest and devotion to the arts. He played the spinet with such grace that Bordentown residents would congregate before his windows to listen. Here he painted many of his sketches and portraits. One of the latter was honored with a misplaced tribute, calling it the work of Copley. Joseph Hopkinson inherited his father's love for verse as well as his legal skill, and entertained distinguished guests, among them Joseph Bonaparte and Thomas Moore. The only notable contribution in verse by Joseph Hopkinson which has survived is the ode, "Hail Columbia! Happy Land!"

The death of Hopkinson followed, within a few months, the decease of Franklin. This circumstance, and the friendship between the two men, gave eulogists an opportunity for extravagant tribute to both. In the Columbian Magazine, May, 1791, appeared a prose obituary of Hopkinson and two elegies. One contained the refrain: "Another sage expired!" The versifier extolled both the gentleness and courage of Hopkinson :

The steady foe of tyranny confess'd,
 Yet with such art and gentleness reprov'd,
 That though some feared his pen, the man was loved.
 And be this line upon his tombstone writ—
The friend of virtue and the friend of wit.

In the prose estimate of Hopkinson's qualities the writer was more restrained and forceful. With truth, he declared :

He thought much and thought justly upon the subject of education. He often ridiculed, in conversation, the practice of teaching children the English language by means of grammar. Sometimes he employed his formidable powers of humor and satire in exposing the formalities of technical science. He was an active and useful member of three great political parties which, at different times, divided his native state—he was a Whig, a republican and a federalist and he lived to see the principles and wishes of each of those parties finally and universally successful. It only remains to add to this account of Mr. Hopkinson that the various causes which contributed to the establishment of the independent and federal government of the United States will not be fully traced unless much is ascribed to the irresistible influence of the ridicule which he poured forth from time to time upon the enemies of those great political events.

PHILIP FRENEAU: AMERICA'S FIRST POET

PHILIP FRENEAU

From a sketch, made in his later years and finished after his death; reproduced from 1865 edition of his Poems.

III

PHILIP FRENEAU: AMERICA'S FIRST POET

Among casual readers the name of Philip Freneau is more familiar than that of other writers of his time, but we need more information about the details of his life and work. Recent indications may be found of an awakening interest in this early poet; his poems have been republished in two large volumes, a full bibliography of his writings has been issued,¹ and bibliophiles are rivaling each other in zeal to acquire first editions of his works.

Freneau was an ardent patriot; he was even a bitter partisan. During the war his satires in verse dismayed English generals and Loyalist sympathizers; during the years of controversy over the best form of government he wrote scathing tracts and editorials against the Federalists and their marked leaders. In this primal attention to his service as satirist and political penman, too little study has been made of the fragmentary, but significant, outbursts of lyrical poetry which were interspersed among his polemics and lampoons. Although the most spontaneous impulses of the lyric poet are found in his earlier stanzas, yet the martial sentiments did not wholly submerge the poetic yearnings in his later years. To Freneau, Mr. Stedman has traced "the first essential poetic spirit" ² in America; he has included several of these poems in his anthology.³

¹ The Poems of Philip Freneau, edited by Fred L. Patee (Princeton, New Jersey, 1902-7; 3 vols.); Bibliography of the Works of Philip Freneau, compiled by Victor Hugo Paltsits (New York, 1903).

As youth and man, Freneau was haunted by vague, restless desires to serve his country, and at the same time win fame for himself by his pen. His fancy and aspirations were early awakened, but, after a few ventures in poetry of the accepted mode, he realized that fate had placed him in conditions which called for other forms of literary service. There is bitterness of disappointment, but there is also determination to serve the hour, in his poem "The Author":

An age employ'd in pointing steel,
Can no poetic raptures feel;

.

The Muse of Love in no request,
I'll try my fortune with the rest.

Which of the Nine shall I engage,

² Edmund Clarence Stedman, Poets of America (Boston, 1896), p. 35.

³ Stedman and Hutchinson, A Library of American Literature (1897), Vol. I.

To suit the humor of the age?
On one, alas! my choice must fall,
The least engaging of them all!
Her visage stern, severe her style,
A clouded brow, a cruel smile,
A mind on murder'd victims plac'd.
She, only she, can please the taste.*

It is not difficult to trace the dual traits of the poet and the patriot in the inheritance of Freneau. A sensitive, romantic strain of ancestry was mingled with the sturdy Huguenot traits of thrift and courage. The grandfather, André Fresneau, came to Boston in 1705. After a brief stay there, he spent a few months in Connecticut, and finally reached New York, where he secured a position with the Royal West India Company. Here he became associated with other men of Huguenot ancestry, who clustered their homes in the vicinity of Pine Street and the old Church of St. Esprit.

He married the granddaughter of John Morin Scott, thus introducing more noble blood into the family. André died in 1725. His second son, Pierre, was the father of the poet. By native talents and marriage ties the family had gained social rank in those days of old New York when the homes of the élite were in lower

Poems Written between the Years 1768 & 1794, by Philip Freneau of New Jersey: A New Edition, Revised and Corrected by the Author (Monmouth, N. J., 1795), p. 327.*

Broadway and Bowling Green. A house, long standing in Frankfort Street, was the birthplace of Philip Freneau in January, 1752. The year of his birth his father bought a thousand acres of land in Monmouth County, New Jersey, building there a large mansion, to which he gave the name "Mont Pleasant," in memory of the fine estate of that name once owned by the family in France.

According to the usual narrative, the Freneau home was transferred from New York to Monmouth. Mr. Pattee thinks that Philip was left at school, in New York, when the family moved away.⁵ In either case, he found the first poetic incentive of his boyhood amid the New Jersey hills, which he so often extolled in verse. His mother, Agnes Watson Freneau, encouraged all the dreamy love for nature and books which the boy revealed. She was a woman with a beautiful face and a fine mind. Her portrait, as a girl of sixteen, was long a treasured heirloom, made doubly romantic by the saber thrust through the heart, which was a reminder of vandal British soldiers. Surviving her first husband by half a century, she married James Kearny. To the end of her ninety years she was a fascinating companion.

⁵ "Introduction" to The Poems of Philip Freneau (1902-7), Vol. I, p. xv.

After a struggle with classic textbooks at the Latin school at Penelopen, Philip Freneau was placed under the tutorship of Rev. William Tennent, of Monmouth, and entered Nassau Hall, Princeton. Probably his roommate was James Madison. The latter was an intimate life-long friend of the poet, and was much enamored of Freneau's sister, Mary, when he visited at Mont Pleasant. Philip's brother, Pierre, generally called Peter, was for many years identified with the political movements in South Carolina, and was an adviser of Jefferson and his party. He inherited much of the ancestral thrift and industry. At college, Philip was a classmate of James Madison, Aaron Burr, Aaron Ogden, and Hugh Henry Brackenridge. As a mere boy he wrote verses. Unfortunately, some of his juvenile and bombastic efforts, like "The Poetical History of the Prophet Jonah," written at the age of fourteen, have been preserved in later editions of his poetry. In collaboration with Brackenridge he wrote the commencement poem at his graduation in 1772—"The Rising Glory of America."⁶ For some reason not explained, both Freneau and Madison were absent, or excused from taking part in the commencement programme, as is shown in a paragraph of record in the History of the College of New Jersey.⁷

⁶ This was published in pamphlet form, A Poem on the Rising Glory of America, etc. (Philadelphia, 1772). It is in his Poems (edition of 1795), pp. 36-46.

An English forensic dispute on the question, "Does ancient Poetry excel the Modern?" Mr. Freneau, the Respondent, being necessarily absent, his arguments, in favor of the Ancients, were read. . . . Mr. James Madison was excused from taking any part in the exercises.

In the same note upon this programme we read, "A Poem on 'The Rising Glory of America' by Mr. Brackenridge, was received with great applause by the audience." Possibly this statement has led to the uncertainty regarding the real authorship of this initial, boyish poem which was afterward included in Freneau's writings. The answer seems to be conclusive, as given by a friend of Brackenridge:

Although he courted the Muses, and in conjunction with the poet Freneau, his classmate, composed a poem on "The Rising Glory of America," he confessed that on his part it was a task of labor, while the verse of his associate flowed spontaneously.⁸

A few lines from this poem indicate both the aspiration and the zeal of its youthful authors; they seem also to prophesy the part that Freneau later was to play in commerce, as well as poetry:

⁷ John MacLean, History of the College of New Jersey: From Its Origin in 1746 to the Commencement of 1854 (Philadelphia, 1877), Vol. I, p. 312, note.

⁸ Southern Literary Messenger, Vol. VIII, No. 1, p. 2.

Great is the praise of commerce, and the men
 Deserve our praise who spread from shore to shore
 The flowing sail; great are their dangers too;
 Death ever present to the fearless eye
 And ev'ry billow but a gaping grave;
 Yet all these mighty feats to Science are Their rise and glory.*

A curious quarto manuscript may be found in the library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, entitled "Father Bumbo's Pilgrimage to Mecca in Arabia, Vol. II., written by H. B. and P. F., 1770." The easy translation of these letters indicates that the two friends had collaborated in poetry before they wrote the commencement poem. These earlier verses relate many adventures, and contain a few doggerel rhymes on political affairs.¹⁰ Occasionally there is a stanza of true appreciation of nature, although expressed in stilted phrase—as this:

Sweet are the flowers that crown the Vale,
 And sweet the spicy breathing Gale,
 That murmurs o'er the hills,
 The hour the distant lowing throng
 Thro' verdant pastures move along,
 To drink from limpid Streams and crystal Rills.

* A Poem on the Rising Glory of America; Being an Exercise Delivered at the Public Commencement at Nassau Hall, September 25, 1772, p. 18.

¹⁰ Bound in the manuscript with this poem is a collection of tirades, probably written by Freneau and his college friends to ridicule a rival society of Tories.

Freneau taught school, for a brief period, after he left college. His first experience was in Flatbush, Long Island, but later he joined Brackenridge in Maryland, at Princess Anne Academy. The two friends made fitful attempts at the study of theology; then abandoned this for law, which became the life-profession of Brackenridge. Freneau's career as pedagogue outlasted his time spent in reading for the ministry and the bar, but he disliked the experience as teacher. His disheartening impressions were given in letters, and also in a droll poem, "The Miserable Life of a Pedagogue." To Madison he wrote of his forced acceptance of a school at Flatbush, and his disgust:

I did enter upon the business of it certain and continued in it thirteen days—but—Long Island I have bid adieu, With all its brainless, brutish crew. The youth of that detested place, Are void of reason and of grace. From Flushing hills to Flatbush plains, Deep ignorance unrivall'd reigns. I'm very poetical but excuse it.¹¹

With more of humor, tintured still by impatience, he wrote his impressions in verse-form for publication:

A plague I say on such employment,
Where's neither pleasure nor enjoyment;
Whoe'er to such life is ty'd,
Was born the day he should have dy'd;

¹¹ Madison Papers, Letters to Madison, November 2, 1772 (Library of Congress), Vol. XIII, p. 9.

Born in an hour when angry spheres
Were tearing caps or pulling ears.
And Saturn slow 'gainst swift Mercurius
Was meditating battles furious;
Or comets with their blazing train,
Decreed their life, a life of pain.¹²

During these early years Freneau did other work more worthy than the poetical efforts quoted; the latter are of interest only in tracing the story of his life, with its varied experiences. Some of his verses, written before the war, portray the customs of his age. When the war was imminent, he began his work as satirist, probably writing a parody on "Gen. Gage's Proclamation," which was widely circulated in the press and also published as a broadside, in June, 1775.¹³ In the aggregate he wrote more than sixty satires, odes, and elegies on the war. One of the best lampoons of the time was "The Midnight Consultations," first issued as "A Voyage to Boston."

¹² This poem was included in a collection, printed as The American Village; A Poem. To Which are Added Several other Original Pieces in Verse. By Philip Freneau, A.B. (New York, 1772). Copies of this are in the Library of Congress and the John Carter Brown Library. From the latter copy a reprint has been made (1906), published by the Club for Colonial Reprints of Providence.

¹³ This is so suggested by Mr. Paltsits, in his Bibliography, p. 27. In The Origin of McFingal, by J. Hammond Trumbull, it is mentioned as possibly by John Trumbull; but this seems unlikely from the internal and collateral evidence. See further explanation on p. 129.

The scene was laid in the quarters of General Gage, the night after the battle of Bunker Hill. Both Lord Percy and General Gage were ridiculed thus:

Lord Percy seem'd to snore—O conscious Muse,
This ill-timed snoring to the Peer excuse,
Tir'd was the Hero of his toilsome day,
Full fifteen miles he fled,—a tedious way—
How should he then the dews of Somnus shun,
Perhaps not us'd to walk, much less to run.

The moan of Gage was a familiar stanza of caricature:

Three weeks—ye gods! nay, three long years it seems,
Since roast beef I have touched except in dreams.
In sleep, choice dishes to my view repair,—
Waking, I gape and clamp the empty air.
Say, is it just that I, who rule these bands,
Should live on husks, like rakes in foreign lands.¹⁴

Uneven in workmanship, with less natural wit than Hopkinson and Trumbull had, Freneau was yet the acknowledged satirist of the war, who accomplished the greatest results in annoying the British and Loyalists and in cheering the patriot leaders. He was ever ready to extol the bravery of the latter, as in his alleged words of Gage, after he realized the valor of the minutemen:

¹⁴“A Voyage to Boston” (Philadelphia, 1775). The quotations given are in the original form, pp. 10 and 15. The whole poem is in Poems Written between the Years 1768 & 1794 (1795), pp. 115-21.

When men like these defy my martial rule,
 Good heaven! it is no time to play the fool.

During the first years of the conflict Freneau was eager to serve his country in military hazards, as well as by writing. He probably entered the army as a private in 1778; possibly he was raised to the rank of sergeant, as is reported in Jersey-men in the Revolution.¹⁵ In his obituary in the New York Spectator there is also reference to his brief service under arms.¹⁶ Whether these statements are fallacious or true—and opinions differ—he did not serve long as a soldier. His sensitive, restless nature fretted against the delays and reactions which preceded and followed the proclamation of independence. While waiting for the issue to come, he carried out a long-cherished plan and made a voyage to the West Indies. Combining trade with pleasure, he delighted in the sunny skies and floral beauties of Jamaica and Santa Cruz. The impressions on his memory and poetic imagination were expressed in such melodic stanzas as this:

Amid the shades of yonder whispering grove,
 The green palmetoes mingle, tall and fair,
 That ever murmur, and forever move,
 Fanning with wavy bough the ambient air.¹⁷

¹⁵ Jersey-men in the Revolution, p. 465. No further information is given.

¹⁶ New York Spectator, December 31, 1832.

¹⁷ "Beauties of Santa Cruz," Poems, etc. (1795), p. 134.

It was under the same influences, environed by the dreamy atmosphere, that he conceived and wrote the first version of "The House of Night."¹⁸ This is a strange, weird vision, somewhat suggestive of Coleridge and Poe. In some passages the uneven meters and the excess of moralizing spoil the poetic beauty, but there are bits of fine and haunting melody, not unlike that of "Ulalume." Such is the picture of "the death of Death" at the hour of midnight:

Sweet vernal May—tho' then thy woods in bloom
 Flourish'd, yet nought of this could Fancy see;
 No wild pinks bless'd the meads, no green the fields,
 And naked seemed to stand each lifeless tree.

Dark was the sky, and not one friendly star
 Shone from the zenith, or horizon clear;
 Mist sate upon the plains, and darkness rode
 In her dark chariot, with her ebon spear.

And from the wilds, the late resounding note
 Issued, of the loquacious whippoorwill;
 Hoarse, howling dogs, and nightly-roving wolves
 Clamour'd, from far-off cliffs invisible.¹⁹

¹⁸ This poem was printed in the United States Magazine, edited by Brackenridge, in August, 1779, pp. 355-63. It has the subtitle "Six Hours Lodging with Death." In the same magazine appeared, that year, other poems by Freneau, including "The Dying Elm," "King George the Third's Soliloquy," and "King George's Speech to Lord North."

¹⁹ Poems, etc. (1795), p. 93. This poem was in the first edition, 1786, pp. 101-23, as "The Vision of Night."

Certain love-sonnets, written during this voyage to southern seas, extolled a "Fair Amanda," to whom the poet paid homage. Miss Austin surmises that she was the daughter of Freneau's host in the Bermudas.²⁰ Such minor experiences, however, were dimmed in remembrance by his exciting adventure in 1780, as he was starting on another voyage for the Indies. His ship, "Aurora," sailing out from Delaware Bay, was pursued and captured by the British ship "The Iris." The account of this capture, and the subsequent horrors on the prison-ship to which he was transferred, afforded theme for one of his most biting satires, "The British Prison-Ship."²¹

After this dramatic experience, Freneau, weakened by fever and exposure, returned to Monmouth, where he wrote a group of deadly satires, incited by personal anger against King George, Lord Cornwallis, Sir Henry Clinton, and the Loyalist printers, Gaine and Rivington. Among the many political verses that he wrote, between 1780 and 1783, three were widely quoted, and represent his versatility in form: "The Last Will and Testament of James Rivington, Printer,"²² "The Prophecy," and the elegy, "To the Memory of the Brave Americans under General Greene, who fell in the action of September 8, 1781." The last poem is better known to modern readers by its later title, "The Battle of Eutaw Springs."

²⁰ Mary S. Austin, Philip Freneau: The Poet of the Revolution, edited by Helen Kearny Vreeland (New York, 1901), p. 88.

²¹ From an unpublished manuscript in prose, said to have been written a few days after the release, there was printed, in 1899, Some Account of the Capture of the Ship Aurora (New York).

"The Prophecy," characterized by bravado and personal thrusts, caught the popular fancy:

When a certain great king whose initial is G,
Shall force stamps upon paper and folks to drink tea;
When these folks burn his tea and stamped paper, like stubble,

You may guess that this king is then coming to trouble.
But when a petition he treads under his feet,
And sends over the ocean an army and fleet;
When that army, half starved and frantic with rage,
Shall be cooped up with a leader whose name rhymes to cage;

When that leader goes home, dejected and sad,
You may then be assured the king's prospects are bad.
But when B. and C. with their armies are taken,
The king will do well if he saves his own bacon.
In the year Seventeen hundred and eighty and two,
A stroke he shall get that will make him look blue;
In the years eighty-three, eighty-four, eighty-five,
You hardly shall know that the king is alive;
In the year eighty-six the affair will be over,

²² Poems, etc. (1795), "The British Prison Ship," p. 161-75:
"James Rivington's Last Will and Testament," p. 204.

And he shall eat turnips that grow in Hanover.
 The face of the Lion shall then become pale,
 He shall yield fifteen teeth and be sherr'd of his tail,
 O king, my dear king, you shall be very sore.
 The Stars and the Lily shall run you on shore,
 And your Lion shall growl but never bite, more.*

As an evidence of the versatility of Freneau, and his skill in other forms of verse than the satire and lampoon, we recall the elegy on the soldiers who fell at the battle of Eutaw Springs. One stanza has gracious truth and deep feeling:

Stranger, their humble graves adorn;
 You too may fall and ask a tear:
 'Tis not the beauty of the morn
 That proves the evening shall be clear.

This was the poem which won praise from Walter Scott "as fine a thing of the kind as there is in the language."²⁴ Critics would charge Scott with plagiarism because, admitting his knowledge of Freneau's poem, he repeated a line almost verbatim, in Marmion: "They took the spear, but left the shield." More probably this was a case of coincidence or literary suggestion.

At the close of the war Freneau was a young man under thirty, with a reputation for mental alertness and wit, but without any definite programme of life or any fixed income. For the next six years he made frequent trips as merchant, and became known as "Captain Freneau." Meanwhile he wrote verses of nature-love and domestic customs, sending these often to the Freeman's Journal and the Pennsylvania Packet, both published in Philadelphia. From these papers the poems were reprinted, without name, in many other journals throughout the country. During the year 1787 alone he gave to the journals mentioned, without signature, such poems as "The Almanack-Maker," "The Deserted Farm-House" (which was also printed in the London Morning Herald, July 12, 1787), "The Hermit," "The Indian Student," and the dainty poem, "May to April," which ranks beside his more familiar "The Wild Honeysuckle,"²⁵ and contains this stanza :

* Poems of Philip Freneau Written Chiefly during the Late War (Philadelphia, 1786), p. 178, Poems (1795), p. 178.

²⁴ Duyckinck, Cyclopaedia of American Literature, Vol. I, p. 335.

Without your showers I breed no flowers,
 Each field a barren waste appears,
 If you don't weep, my blossoms sleep,
 They take such pleasure in your tears.²⁶

²⁵ Freeman's Journal or North American Intelligencer (published by Francis Bailey); Pennsylvania Packet and Daily Advertiser; Freneau's poems in the issues for February 14, April 2, April 18, (Packet), May 24, (Packet), June 9 (Packet), June 20, November 14, etc. In these papers appeared also an advertisement of the first collection of Freneau's poems, in 1786 (published by Bailey).

²⁶ Cf. Poems (1795), p. 96.

Freneau had special reasons for wishing to end his roving life and gain a stable income; for he married, in 1790, Eleanor Forman, a fine woman belonging to a well-known New Jersey family. She had a taste for versifying, and the lovers corresponded "in lyric measures" for more than a year before marriage, under the names of "Ella" and "Birtha."²⁷ As he lacked training for any other profession, Freneau decided to try to find a place as editor, after his return to New York in 1789, from a trip to Charleston as merchant.²⁸ For several months he was associated, perhaps as editor, with the New York Daily Advertiser, published then by Childs and Swaine.²⁹ Here he came into friendly relations with John Pintard, who gave valuable reminiscences of Freneau after the latter's death.

Jefferson heard of Freneau as a strong Democrat in principles and a keen writer. He met him at the house of a friend, and was further influenced in his favor by Madison. The first direct evidence of Jefferson's interest in Freneau was his appointment of the poet, in 1791, as foreign translator for the Department of State to succeed Pintard, who did not care to leave New York when the seat of government was moved to Philadelphia. The work of this position was not heavy, and its requirements were small—"no other qualification than a moderate knowledge of French," according to Jefferson's words. The salary of $200 a year was acceptable to the young man. This appointment, held by Freneau during the two years when he was editing an Anti-Federalist paper, was widely advertised and brought upon him attacks by political opponents, who spared not Jefferson in their innuendoes. An interesting, unpublished letter has come to my notice, which bears upon this situation, in the manuscript Pickering Papers, at the Massachusetts Historical Society.³⁰ The letter was written to Timothy Pickering by George Taylor, Jr., from Philadelphia, January 23, 1809:

²⁷ These same names, "Ella" and "Birtha," were used by two other poets who contributed to Fenno's Gazette of the United States, 1791. See issues for February 23, April 16, May 14, etc. For these dates I am indebted to Mr. Victor H. Paltsits.

²⁸ For information regarding this fact and his marriage, see Narrative of a Journey down the Ohio and Mississippi, by Major Samuel Forman (1789-90; reprinted 1888), pp. 10-11).

²⁹ Hudson, History of Journalism in the United States (1873), p. 175.

In order to give a full view of the circumstances under which Mr. Freneau was employed as Interpreter for the Department of State, by Mr. Jefferson, it will be requisite for me to go as far back as the year 1785.

³⁰ Pickering Papers, Vol. XXIX, No. 50. Copied by permission. The official correspondence on this appointment is in Jefferson Papers (Library of Congress), Series I, Vol. IV, No. 153, Vol. IX, No. 250; Series II, Vol. XXXIII, No. 48.

On the first day of January in that year several of my friends at New York, without my knowledge, having recommended me to Mr. Jay, then Secretary for foreign affairs, one of them mentioned it to me and desired me to wait upon him, which I did, when he engaged me as a Clerk in that Department. Shortly after, Mr. Jay in conversation pointed out to me the advantage of acquiring a knowledge of the French & Spanish Languages. Not being able to find a suitable Teacher of the latter, I commenced the study of the former and occasionally upon emergencies, I translated for the Department.

When in 1789 the seat of Government was about being removed from New York, finding the interpreter for the Department did not mean to go with it, I called upon Mr. Jay and mentioned the circumstance to him, at the same time intimating that, as I knew from the friendship he had evinced for me, he would not hesitate to say whether he thought me competent and that in case he did, I should esteem it a favor if he would mention me to Mr. Jefferson, as a candidate for that office. He at once said that he thought I was; that he conceived it of importance to have the secrets of the Department confined to as few a number as possible, or to those already employed in it and therefore would with pleasure call upon Mr. Jefferson on the subject. The day following Mr. Jay informed me that he had mentioned the matter to Mr. Jefferson who had declined making the appointment until he should get to Philadelphia, and advised me then to renew my application.

This I accordingly did. Mr. Jefferson told me that he did not conceive he could with propriety give me the two salaries. I observed that my salary as clerk was small, and that that of the Interpreter being only 250 Dollars no man would accept but as a secondary object, and of course the business of the office must frequently be interrupted in waiting for translations—that if I held it, I would always attend to it seasonably, without its interfering with my other official duty. He concluded by saying that he should not at present fill up the vacancy.

Some months or weeks after this, I received a letter from a friend at New York informing me that he had been told by Mr. Freneau that he was appointed Interpreter for the Department of State. I replied that it could not be correct—for that before the Government removed from that city, having the french treaties to collate, and he being in the employment of Childs & Swain, who were printing them, I asked him to assist in the collation and he declined it, alleging that he did not sufficiently understand the language, but from its affinity to the Latin, made out to read it.

However, he soon after came to this city, received the appointment and in some cases I have assisted a Dutch gentleman then an inmate of my family to translate french documents put into his hands by Mr. Freneau, which to my knowledge belonged to the Department of State. . . . I do not recollect when he resigned but believe it was in the summer of 1793—as in the winter of 1793–1794 I translated the documents in the voluminous correspondence between the Department of State and Genet. . . .

We must recall that this letter was written by a disappointed candidate for the office given to Freneau, but it indicates the stress of feeling on the matter of this appointment. This was increased when, in October, 1791, Freneau started a newspaper, openly anti-Federalist in its principles and merciless in its attacks upon Washington and Hamilton. There is evidence that Freneau did not come to Philadelphia as an editor very willingly, for he had planned to start a democratic newspaper near his Monmouth home, and preferred to keep his residence there. Madison urged him to come to Philadelphia, but he still demurred, and Jefferson feared that he had lost his editorial ally. The former wrote to Randolph, his son-in-law, of the influence wielded by Fenno's Gazette of the United States, saying:

You will have perceived that the latter (Fenno's) is a paper of pure Toryism, disseminating the doctrines of monarchy, aristocracy, and the exclusion of the people. We have been trying to get another weekly or half-weekly set up, excluding advertisements, so that it might go through the states and furnish a whig vehicle of intelligence. We hoped at one time to have persuaded Freneau to set up here, but failed.²¹

The relations between Jefferson and Freneau, in connection with the National Gazette, have never been fully settled. In his own age the poet was very severely arraigned on account of his editorials against the Federal leaders. Many of his friends, in later life, felt that he had been merely a tool in the hands of Jefferson. Others—and this seems the more reasonable opinion—believed in his independent advocacy of democratic principles. The sarcasms which gave spice to the editorial columns differed little from the same form of writing in Freneau's earlier and later works. Jefferson was, naturally, well pleased to have such a keen free-lance to support his views, and he probably gave Freneau encouragement and access to any democratic publications or criticisms on the aristocratic tendencies of the Federalists. The detailed story of Freneau's service as editor of this journal, and his principles at the time, have been well studied by Dr. Samuel E. Forman in "The Political Activities of Philip Freneau."⁸²

²¹ Writings of Thomas Jefferson, Vol. V, p. 336.

In the library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania is a manuscript letter from Freneau to William B. Giles, dated December 2, 1793, in which he announces the suspension of the National Gazette, thanks his patron for his subscription, and expresses a hope that the paper may be revived. The paper had suspended publication on October 26; doubtless the prevalence of yellow fever in Philadelphia affected both its receipts and its continuance. Jefferson openly expressed regret that the Gazette was discontinued, and thus emphasized its importance: "His paper has saved our constitution which was galloping fast into monarchy & has been checked by no means so powerfully as by that paper." ⁸³

⁸² Samuel E. Forman, "The Political Activities of Philip Freneau," Johns Hopkins University Studies in Historical and Political Science, Series XX, Nos. 9, 10, September-October, 1902. Jefferson's explanation is in his Writings, Vol. VI, pp. 101-09.

A comparison of the two Gazettes of this time and city—those edited by Freneau and Fenno in the interests of the Democratic and the Federal parties respectively ⁸⁴—reveals many interesting paragraphs. The tone of difference was at first mild and courteous, but gradually waxed bitter and sharp. Freneau printed in his Gazette, throughout its existence, some of his verses of lighter vein, as "The Country Printer," "The Jug of Rum," and "The Pilot of Hatteras," as well as his more philosophical reverie "On the Sleep of Plants." ⁸⁵ After Freneau's Gazette had been published for a few weeks, the attacks which he made, with subtle, withering ridicule, upon Hamilton and John Adams called forth answering assaults in Fenno's Gazette. The latter were less witty and far more virulent. The chief charge which they raised against Freneau was that he had accepted a place as interpreter in the Department of State and was guilty of treasonous censure upon the very government which he served.

⁸³ Writings of Thomas Jefferson, Vol. I, p. 231.

⁸⁴ Freneau's paper was styled the National Gazette; Fenno's, the Gazette of the United States. Files of these rival journals may be found at libraries in Philadelphia and at the Library of Congress.

⁸⁵ See National Gazette for November 14, and December 19, 1791; January 16, and January 23, 1792.

The most pointed attack was in Fenno's Gazette, in July, 1792, signed "T. L.,"⁸⁸ inquiring whether Freneau's salary was paid for translating or for publications which vilified the government which he served. With a sting, which was intended to pierce the mind of Jefferson, he added: "In common life it is thought ungrateful for a man to bite the hand that puts bread in his mouth, but if the man is hired to do it, the case is altered."

Because of insinuations like the above, Freneau was urged by Jefferson's friends to take an oath before the mayor of Philadelphia that no negotiation was ever opened with him by Thomas Jefferson, Secretary of State, for the establishment or institution of the National Gazette; that the deponent's coming to the city of Philadelphia as a publisher of a newspaper was at no time urged, advised or influenced by the above officer, but that it was his own voluntary act;—that not a line was ever directly or indirectly written, dictated or composed for it by that officer, but that the editor had consulted his own judgment alone in the conducting of it—free, unfettered and uninfluenced.⁸⁹

While the question of his coming to Philadelphia at the urgent wish of Jefferson would seem to be answered in the affirmative by some of the ⁸⁸The communications thus signed have been generally assigned to Alexander Hamilton. Freneau wrote in severe satire on Hamilton's assertion that "a public debt is a public blessing."

⁸⁹*Gazette of the United States*, August, 1792; also given in Forman, Political Activities of Philip Freneau, p. 56.

letters of both Freneau and Jefferson, still extant and quoted, yet the oath was probably taken in good faith. Freneau's enemies were not satisfied to accept it thus. They charged him with perjury, and he was long suspected. In the main, he did not reply directly in his paper to such charges, but the pronounced inference from the paragraphs by "T. L.," just quoted, that he was a mere hireling of a political leader, roused his anger, and he quoted the accusation, and made answer:⁸⁸

The above is beneath a reply. It might be queried, however, whether a man who receives a small stipend for services rendered as a French translator to the department of State, and, as editor of a free newspaper admits into his publication impartial strictures on the proceedings of gov't, is not more likely to act an honest and disinterested part towards the public, than a vile sycophant,⁸⁹ who obtaining emoluments from government far more lucrative than the salary alluded to (by undermining another man who was in possession of the employ) finds his interests in attempting to poison the minds of the people by propagating and disseminating principles & sentiments utterly subvertive of the true republican interests of this country, and by flattering and recommending every and any measure of government, however pernicious & destructive its tendency might be, to the great body of people. The world is left to decide on the motives of each.

⁸⁸ National Gazette, July 28, 1792, p. 3.

⁸⁹ John Fenno, the editor of the rival Gazette, was printer to the Senate of the United States, and also for the Treasury Department. His emoluments were declared to be two thousand or twenty-five hundred dollars a year. See article, signed G, in National Gazette, August 15, 1792.

This prose statement was followed by an ode, beginning :

Since the day we attempted the Nation's Gazette,
Pomposo's dull printer does nothing but fret.

Now preaching
And screeching,
Then nibbling
And scribbling
Remarking
And barking,
Repining
And Whining,

And still in a pet

From morning to night with the Nation's Gazette.

Instead of whole columns our page to abuse,
Your readers would rather be treated with news ;

While wars are a-brewing,
And kingdoms undoing,
While monarchs are falling,
And princesses squalling,
While France is reforming,
And Irishmen storming,
In a glare of such splendour,
What nonsense to fret
At so humble a thing
As—the Nation's Gazette.

Freneau's criticism of Washington as President, and of his party, did not lessen his admiration for the man and the soldier. Among many elegies upon Washington were three by Freneau, sympathetic and loyal. In one he expressed just resentment at the extravagant eulogies so common at the time of Washington's death; with directness and truth he summarized the hero's traits:

He was no god, ye flattering knaves,
 He owned no world, he ruled no waves;
 But,—and exalt it if you can,—
 He was the upright, HONEST MAN.

This was his glory, this outshone
 Those attributes you doat upon;
 On this strong ground he took his stand,
 Such virtue saved a sinking land.⁴⁰

In further proof of the kindly personal relations which existed between Washington and Freneau, the latter's daughter recalled a visit which Washington made to their Monmouth home, when he was an honored guest and devoted himself to the children.⁴¹ In contrast with this family story was another, from the same source, which would give weight to the suggestion that Freneau was not on very cordial terms with Jefferson after the abandonment of the Gazette. It was reported that Jefferson, when President, would befriend Freneau, who was in financial ⁴⁰ A Collection of Poems, etc. (New York, 1815), Vol. I, p. 161.

⁴¹ Mary S. Austin, Philip Freneau: The Poet of the Revolution, p. 170.

stress, by appointing him as postmaster, and he summoned Freneau to an audience. The poet returned a haughty answer: "Tell Thomas Jefferson that he knows where Philip Freneau lives, and if he has important business with him, let him come to Philip Freneau's house and transact it."⁴²

After the failure of his Gazette, Freneau seemed to meet rebuffs and reverses until the end of his life—a period of forty years. As a poet, he often lost heart and was deeply depressed by the surroundings of his chequered life. In such moods he wrote some of his poems, like "To the Americans of the United States," in 1796:

The coming age will be an age of prose:
When sordid cares will break the Muse's dream,
And Common Sense be ranked in seat supreme.

In spite of such expressions of bitterness, there were flashes of poetic impulse, and constantly recurring ambitions to try again his fate as poet-editor. After he had moved his types from Philadelphia to Monmouth, he printed there the revised edition of his poems, adding only a few new ones, but reprinting, with some corrections, ⁴² Loc. cit., p. 173. Mr. Pattee, in the "Introduction" to his edition of Freneau's Poems, tells the same story, but substitutes the name of Madison for that of Jefferson, with no explanation other than that of the poet's pride (Vol. I, p. lxxx).

those that had been printed by Bailey in 1786 and 1788.⁴³

For a year he was editor and printer of a curious little sheet, the Jersey Chronicle.⁴⁴ Its eight quarto pages contained spirited comments on politics and literature, with occasional jibes at the "aggravating insults offered to Americans, notwithstanding the treaty by Mr. Jay, from which the temporizing citizens of America expected so many advantages."⁴⁵ The motto of this paper was an apt quotation from Horace: Inter sylvas Academi quaerere verum. In a letter to Madison he enlarged upon his plans to spend the rest of his life upon his Monmouth estate and edit "a small weekly newspaper calculated for the part of the country" in which he resided. Apparently the neighborhood failed to respond. After the abandonment of the journal, from lack of subscriptions, Freneau wrote again to Madison:

After experiencing one or two disappointments, I am now, through the kind aid of some friends here, nearly completing the project of a co-partnership with Thomas ⁴³ Poems Written between the Years 1768 & 1794 by Philip Freneau of New Jersey. A New Edition, Revised and Corrected by the Author. Monmouth (N. J.). Printed at the Press of the Author: M, DCC, XCV.

⁴⁴ Jersey Chronicle, Monmouth (N. J.), May 2, 1795, to April 30, 1796; file in Lenox Library.

⁴⁵ From the issue of April 2, 1796, in the American Antiquarian Society.

Greenleaf in his two Papers, The Argus, a Daily publication, and The New York Journal, twice a week: both on a pretty respectable footing, and noted for a steady attachment to Republican principles, though open to all decent speculations from any party if they choose to transmit them. In short, I would wish to revive something in the spirit of the National Gazette, if time and circumstances allow, and with proper assistance hope to succeed;—

Thus,

A Raven once an acorn took,
 From Bashan's strongest stoutest trees;
 He hid it near a murmuring brook,
 And liv'd another oak to see.⁴⁶

Whether as a result of this project and assistance, or following another disappointment, Freneau entered upon his last journalistic venture, in New York, in April, 1797, where for about a year he edited a tri-weekly, the Time-Piece and Literary Companion.⁴⁷ He had two associates, in turn, A. Menut and M. L. Davis, the latter continuing the paper for a few months after Freneau had withdrawn for lack of financial return. In this journal appeared some of Freneau's poems, and his translation of "New Travels of M. Abbe Robin in North America"—spicy prose with satiric touches.

⁴⁶ Madison Papers, Freneau to Madison, December 1, 1796 (Library of Congress), Vol. XXI, p. 70.

⁴⁷ Time-Piece and Literary Companion, New York, April, 1797, to March, 1798.

The prose style of Freneau was, at its best, crisp and simple, in contrast with the labored pedantry of his contemporaries. Perhaps the most representative example is *Letters by Robert Slender, O. S. M.*⁴⁸ The "Advice to Young Authors," in this collection, has a sensible reminder: "Never make a present of your works to great men. If they do not think them worth purchasing, trust me they will never think them worth reading." "Robert Slender, Stocking-Weaver," became a favorite pseudonym for Freneau, used both in prose and verse. In the library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania can be found two copies of a pamphlet, *A Laughable Poem or Robert Slender's Journey from Philadelphia to New York by Way of Burlington and South Amboy.*⁴⁹ Intended as a farce, the characters include Robert Slender, Mr. Snip, Billy O'Bluster, Snipinda, and the milliner's maid. In plot, the writing is farcical, but the tale does not appeal strongly to our conception of the "laughable." There is drollery, and a rollicking meter in some portions, as in chapter 6, "The Chapter of Vexations and Disasters," which

* The letters "O.S.M." meant "One of the Swinish Multitude." Many of these letters are also in Freneau's Miscellaneous Works (Philadelphia, 1788).

* This bore imprint, Philadelphia, 1809. 24 pp. A copy is also in Brown University Library. It is in his Poems (1795), pp. 338-50.

recalls the discomforts of that day of post-chaise traveling:

Coop'd up in a waggon, the curtains let down,
 At three in the morning, we drove out of town:
 A morning more dark I ne'er saw in my life,
 And the fog was so thick it would cut with a knife;
 In a morning like this were the Trojans undone,
 When the horse was admitted, that never could run:
 It was a fit season for murders and rapes,
 For drunken adventures and narrow escapes.
 So, with something to think of, and little to say,
 The driver drove on, looking out for the day,
 Till we came to the brow of a damnable hill
 Six miles on our way, when the cattle stood still;
 "Are you sure you are right with the Waggon," cry'd Snip.
 "I am," said the driver, and crack'd with his whip,
 Then away ran the horses, but took the wrong road
 And down went the waggon, with all its full load,
 Down, deep in a valley,—roll'd over and over,
 Fell the flying machine, with its curtains and cover,
 Where shatter'd and wounded, no glimpse yet of day
 A mass of perdition, together we lay!

The losses which resulted from his failures in journalism crippled Freneau's Monmouth property, as was shown in mortgages placed upon the estate after 1805. He sought to redeem his fortunes by a return to seafaring and trading. His brother in South Carolina assisted him with commercial aid. From 1804 to 1809 he made several trips as a trader to southern states; but the journeys became irksome to him, and he longed for retirement to his rural home. His last long cruise was to the Canary Islands in 1807, as he told Madison in a letter eight years afterward, in which he announced a new, expensive edition of his poems, to be issued by David Longworth, and to be paid for by subscription. This was the second two-volume edition which had been printed. The earlier venture, made in 1809, was an act of generosity, according to his statement to Madison, in the same letter :

That edition was published by subscription merely for the benefit of, and to assist Mrs. Bailey, an unfortunate but deserving widowed female, niece of General Steele, and this consideration alone induced me to pay some attention to that third edition.

Freneau was keenly hurt by the lack of appreciation among his contemporaries; he yearned for some true sympathy and helpful criticism. The praise which he received was couched in the extravagant language of the day, and was irritating rather than stimulating. Such was the rough verse in which Colonel Parke heralded him, after Freneau's first collection of poems appeared, in 1786. Possibly the humor of Freneau helped him to appreciate the last line :

And when you are number'd alas! with the dead,
Your work by true wits will forever be read,

 Madison Papers, MS. (Library of Congress), January 12, 1815.

Who, pointing the finger, shall pensively show
The lines that were written, alas! by Freneau.⁸¹

Another droll tribute followed his poem, "The Pilot of Hatteras," by "Captain Freneau," in the Freeman's Journal three years later:

This celebrated genius, the Peter Pindar of America, is now master of a Packet, which runs between New York, Philadelphia and Charleston. His tuneful numbers during the war did much to soften the disagreeable sensations which a state of warfare so generally occasions.⁸²

With the readers of his own day Freneau's verses with a humorous tone were in greatest favor, such as "Crispin O'Connor," "Advice to the Ladies Not to Neglect the Dentist," "The Village Merchant," and "Farmer Dobbins's Complaint." There was a coarse humor, on a favorite subject of joke, in the last-named doggerel:

Three daughters I have and as prettily made,
As handsome as any you'll see;
And lovers they count,—but still I'm afraid
They always will hang upon me.

These bucks of the town with their elegant coats
I'm sick of their horses and chairs.
They plunder my hay and they pilfer my oats,—
Am I keeping a tavern, my dears?⁸³

⁸¹ Freeman's Journal, June 21, 1786.

⁸² Ibid., December 9, 1789.

⁸³ (Poems, 1795, p. 19). In the National Gazette, August 25, 1792, this poem appeared as "Farmer Dobbins to the Buck-Suitors," signed "Dobbins".

This song, with two others by Freneau—"The Indian Student" and "The Rights of Man"—was included in The Columbian Songster or Jovial Companion, a collection of popular airs published in 1797. They are ranked there with Hopkinson's "Battle of the Kegs" and "With Jemmy on the Sea."

Another favorite poem, ascribed in his own day to Freneau, and sung by school-children until recent years, was "The Death-Song of a Cherokee Indian." It is not found in any of Freneau's collected poems, and was ascribed to Mrs. Ann Hunter, of England, before 1806. There still seems justice in asking if it may not have been written or adapted by Freneau. As "original poetry" it was contributed to the American Museum, in January 1787, with unquestioned authorship by Freneau, thus announced:

THE DEATH-SONG OF A CHEROKEE INDIAN

By P. Freneau.

The sun sets at night; and the stars shun the day;
But glory remains when their lights fade away.
Begin, ye tormentors: your threats are in vain:
For the son of Alknomock will never complain.

Remember the woods where in ambush he lay,
And the scalps which he bore from his nation away,
Why do ye delay?—till I shrink from my pain?
Know the son of Alknomock can never complain.

Remember the arrows he shot from his bow :
 Remember your chiefs by his hatchet laid low,
 The flame rises high. You exult in my pain :
 But the son of Alknomock will never complain.

I go to the land where my father is gone :
 His ghost shall exult in the fame of his son.
 Death comes like a friend. He relieves me from pain.
 And thy son, O Alknomock, has scorn'd to complain.

Duyckinck, the friend of Freneau in later life, included this poem, among Freneau's, in his Cyclopaedia of American Literature, with a note of explanation. Royall Tyler introduced it, with the music, into his play, The Contrast;⁵⁴ it seems unlikely that he would have used an English song in this first American drama, with its intense Yankeeism. In style of writing, in sentiment and theme, it is accordant with Freneau's poetry, and with his admiration for the defiant prowess of the Indian. In "The Indian Burying-Ground" he praised the custom of leaving the warriors, after death, in an upright posture, symbolizing immediate action and defiance to the wiles of the enemy. In "The Indian Student," one of his best poems, he awakened sympathy for his hero, yearning for the free life of the forest, when he had been taken from it and placed at college :

A little could my wants supply,—
 Can wealth or honor give me more;

⁵⁴ The Contrast (Philadelphia, 1790).

Or, will the sylvan god deny
 The humble treat he gave before?
 Let seraphs reach the bright abode
 And Heaven's sublimest mansions see,—
 I only bow to NATURE'S GOD,
 The Land of Shades will do for me.⁵⁸

Reading with care this group of Freneau's poems on Indian character, it seems as if the song in question might be his rendering. It was written after the first edition of his poems was printed, in 1786. The second edition, his Miscellaneous Works,⁵⁸ in 1788, was compiled while he was away at sea, by the printer Bailey, and Freneau regretted that he was not consulted in its preparation. He had an opportunity to place this poem in his Monmouth reprint, in 1795, but before the edition of 1809 appeared, the poem had been ascribed to Mrs. Hunter. Possibly Freneau was content to have it recognized as his in America, and would not openly dispute its authorship. On the other hand, it must be confessed that Freneau seldom omitted to claim as his own all his verses that had appeared in magazines or ⁵⁸ Poems Written between the Years 1768 & 1794 (Monmouth, 1795), p. 80. When this poem appeared in the Pennsylvania Packet, June 9, 1787, unsigned, Freneau explained a reference to "Harvard's Hall," with accurate details, as at Cambridge, Mass.

⁵⁹ The Miscellaneous Writings of Mr. Philip Freneau (Philadelphia, 1788).

newspapers, and were adapted for inclusion in his collected poems.

The last thirty years of Freneau's life were full of memories and fading hopes rather than much active service. He wrote occasional essays and poems for the newspapers, often unsigned; many of them may be found in Bache's Aurora, a Philadelphia journal of democratic trend. The War of 1812 called forth from him several patriotic odes, celebrating the victories of Hull, Decatur, and their crews. Belonging to this period of composition was his "Ode to Liberty," beginning, "God save the Rights of Man," which was sung for many years to the tune of England's national hymn—the same which was later chosen for Dr. Smith's national hymn of America. Because of the interest which seemed to be revived in Freneau by his celebrant poems written during and after the second war with England, Longworth decided to issue his poems in a two-volume edition. This was done in 1815,⁵⁷ and such recognition nourished a feeling of grateful pride in the poet's heart. To Madison he wrote:

I found last winter that an edition would soon be going on at all events, and in contradiction to my wishes, as I had left these old scribblings to float quietly down the stream of oblivion to their destined element, the ocean of forgetfulness. . . . I do not know that the Verses are of any superior or very unusual merit, but he tells me the Town will have them, and of course, have them they will, and must, it seems."⁸⁸

⁵⁷ A Collection of Poems, etc. (2 vols.; New York, 1815).

It is pathetic to follow, in letters, Freneau's rising hopes as a poet, gradually sinking into feigned indifference, then into periods of silence from wounded pride. Although he spoke slightly of his verses, they were very precious to him, and he grieved at each new sign of neglect by the public. Such a temperament, however, will feed upon its own food of fancy and hope; his imaginative delights were confessed in one of his most dainty odes, "Apostrophe to Fancy":

Wakeful, vagrant, restless thing,
 Ever wandering on the wing,
 Who thy wondrous source can find,
 FANCY, regent of the mind!

 FANCY, to thy power I owe
 Half my happiness below;
 By thee Elysian groves were made,
 Thine were the notes that Orpheus play'd;
 By thee was Pluto charm'd so well
 While rapture seized the sons of hell;
 Come, O come, perceiv'd by none,
 You and I will walk alone."⁸⁹

⁸⁸ Madison Papers, Vol. XXXV, p. 17; letter dated January 12, 1815.

⁸⁹ "Ode to Fancy," Poems Written between the Years 1768 & 1794 (1795), p. 31.

During the last years of his life Freneau was often seen in New York, where he would come from Monmouth to visit his friends—Governor Clinton, Dr. John Francis, and other men of note and letters. He persistently refused to sit for a portrait, but, on one of these visits to New York, his face was sketched; after his death the drawing was enlarged, and is the only likeness which we possess. The eyes, there pictured, represent the tender heart which could not endure the sacrifice of a chicken or the killing of a fly, and which prompted him to manumit all the slaves on his estate and support the old servants from an income which was insufficient for all his own needs. He had collected one of the best private libraries in his neighborhood; this, with many other treasured heirlooms, was destroyed by fire in 1818. After the loss of his home, he passed the rest of his days at the former home of Mrs. Freneau's father, in the vicinity. He had four daughters, but no son. His second daughter, Agnes Freneau Leadbeater, was a beautiful, witty woman. Her son perpetuated the family name by changing the order of his surnames. She was often her father's companion on his visits to New York; she also inherited some of his poetic gifts and wrote graceful rhymes of domestic life.

Like many men of his age, Freneau delighted to mix a "glass of flip" for convivial occasions, although in his verses he advises against the excessive use of tobacco and "the jug of rum." One of his most spontaneous lyrics was the poem of friendship, "The Parting Glass," with its closing stanza :

With him who loves a pot of ale,
Who holds to all an even scale ;
Who hates a knave in each disguise,
And fears him not whate'er his size,—
With him, well pleased my days to pass,
May Heaven forbid THE PARTING GLASS.*

Freneau was found frozen to death in a bog-meadow after a severe snowstorm, in December, 1831. He was returning, in the evening, from a call upon a friend a short distance from his home and, at his advanced age, was not able to battle against one of the most turbulent storms of the winter.⁶¹ Local and New York newspapers published brief obituaries of the poet whom his countrymen had seemed to forget. Side by side, in a field near his former home, are the graves of Freneau and his wife. His resting-place was beneath a tree where he frequently sat and mused. Near by flows the little stream which inspired one of his sprightly poems, "The Brook of the Valley" :

Poems Written between the Years 1768 & 1794 (1795)*, p. 85.

⁶¹ Newspapers of the time mention this storm as unusually severe.

When the shower of waters fell,
 How you raged, and what a swell!
 All your banks you overflow'd
 Scarcely knew your own abode!

How you battled with the rock!
 Gave my willow such a shock
 As to menace by its fall
 Underbrush and bushes, all!

Muddy now and limpid next,
 Now with icy shackles vex,—
 What a likeness here we find!
 What a picture of mankind!*

There were winsome traits in the personality of this elder poet. He was impractical in business and aggressive in political feelings, but he left some tuneful, hopeful messages of devotion to nature and sane living.⁶⁸ He was not so far removed from our pioneer writers of repute, as we might surmise. When he died, Irving and his Knickerbocker friends had written, not alone the Salmagundi Papers and the Knickerbocker History of New York, but also The Sketch Book and Bracebridge Hall. Emerson, at twenty-nine, already gave promise of becoming a force in American letters. Bryant had written Thanatopsis fifteen years before, and was in the full maturity of his development. Longfellow and

* The Poems of Philip Freneau (1815), Vol. II, p. 83.

 It is fitting that on his tombstone should be read "A Poet's Grave."

Whittier had sounded the primal notes of their poetry. During the last years of Freneau's life a wave of interest in American authors began to spread over the land. He was not included in the generous plaudits of reviewers—possibly because the stigma of his political virulence against Washington's administration was not forgotten. To claim that he was the most gifted poet of American literature, prior to the nineteenth century, is not extravagant tribute, for the attempts at verse were crude imitations of Pope and Gray. Many of such imitators, who gained more renown in their time than did Freneau, are now wholly forgotten, while his work is gaining attention. The true distinction that he merits is as the first poet of indigenous themes, with a fearless strength and a true promise. In his poems are hints of later, more familiar verses; his lyric "To a Caty-did" seems suggestive, both in fancy and form, of Dr. Holmes's "To an Insect":⁶⁴

Tell me, what did Caty do?
Did she mean to trouble you?
Why was Caty not forbid
To trouble little Caty-did?
Wrong indeed, at you to fling,
Hurting no one while you sing
"Caty-did! Caty-did! Caty-did!"
Why continue to complain?
Caty tells me she again

⁶⁴ A Collection of Poems, etc. (1815), Vol. II, pp. 84-86.

Will not give you plague or pain:—
Caty says you may be hid,
Caty will not go to bed
While you sing us "Caty-did!
Caty-did! Caty-did! Caty-did!"

Freneau's poems reveal his blended traits—playfulness mingled with intense zeal, affability with possible rancor, delight in mystic fancy with vital interest in true democracy. In his satires and essays he showed his knowledge of the best English models; his sharp war-poems were often reflections of the Latin satirists. His lyrics of greatest skill were adaptations of Gray and Cowper, with unmistakable signs of originality in thought. Although he retained traits of French parentage, he was a true American, who shared fully in his country's struggles and rejoiced in its progress.

JOHN TRUMBULL: SATIRIST AND SCHOLAR

JOHN TRUMBULL

Judge and author. From a portrait painted by John Trumbull, artist, and engraved by Durand.

IV

JOHN TRUMBULL: SATIRIST AND SCHOLAR

According to a romantic tradition, a yeoman, in the time of an early English king, risked his own life in saving his majesty from an attack by an angry bull. In return for this service he was knighted as Turn-bull, with three bulls' heads for insignia and a bull's head for a crest. A descendant of this hero married a wealthy woman, and the remembrance of the knight's courage could not atone to her and her husband for the unpleasant name. He requested that, for his branch, the letters might be transferred; hence the name was called Trumbull or Trumble. The American progenitor of this family settled at Ipswich, in 1645, and had three sons—John, Jonathan, and Benoni—from whom were descended the two Governors Jonathan, the portrait-painter John, and the satirist of the same name.

The little parish of Westbury, Connecticut, now a part of Waterbury, called as pastor of its village church, in 1729, a young man of athletic build, John Trumble. His muscularity seemed to make the first deep impression, according to a story often repeated. A band of competitive wrestlers, known as "Town Spotters," were accustomed to meet at a "half-way house" in the neighborhood, to decide the championship of the town. On one occasion, when the last wrestler had won the contest, a masked stranger appeared, caught the champion by the foot, and threw him on the open fire. The stranger disappeared suddenly but was soon after recognized as the young minister, Mr. Trumble.

In the first church of the adjacent town of Waterbury there ministered a Mr. Leavensworth. Chancing to meet his Westbury colleague soon after the wrestling, he rebuked him for two sins—levity, and rashness in tossing the wrestler so near the fire, at the risk of fatal injury. With a wit which was as bold as his courage, the younger clergyman accepted the rebuke for levity, but declared: "As for the scorching, I thought it might be my duty to give your parishioners a foretaste of what they might expect after sitting under your preaching."¹

This Rev. John Trumble was a man of unusual traits, and became the father of a remarkable scholar. His second son, John, is the subject of this chapter. In those days before preparatory schools, the local minister, if a good classical scholar, was often chosen as tutor to fit boys for college. Among the students whom Mr. Trumble was instructing in the mysteries of Cordeus, Tully, and other classic texts, was William Southmayd, seventeen years old. The task seems to have been laborious for both teacher and pupil, but persistence won success. While this youth was struggling with his classic enemies, a little boy of six or seven years played about in the minister's study and, perhaps unconsciously, acquired the Latin words which daunted the older pupil.

¹ This story is told fully in The Town and City of Waterbury, Connecticut, from the Aboriginal Period to the Year Eighteen Hundred and Ninety-Five, edited by Joseph Anderson, D.D. (New Haven, 1896), Vol. I, p. 326, 327.

If we can believe the family journals—and there seems to be no good reason for distrusting them—little John Trumble² was the great American prodigy. At two years he recited all The New England Primer and Watts's Divine Songs for Children. At two and a half he could read, and at four or five he made his first reading-excursion through the Bible and Watts's Lyrics. At the same age he composed rhymes in the form of his venerable model, and "lay awake some nights" to get the correct prosody. By some unexplained lapse, he was unable to write until he was five; so he preserved his hymnal compositions in printed letters.³

²The name was spelt Trumble in records until about 1768.

After such a life-record of five years, one is not surprised to read that from five to seven he mastered many of the Greek and Latin texts required for entrance to college. When two candidates were presented at Yale, in 1757, by Rev. Mr. Trumble, the older pupil was nineteen and the younger, his son, was seven years and five months. Dr. E. A. Park, in his Sketch of Nathaniel Emmons, states that the latter had the honor of "holding on his knee" young Trumble, as he was examined in the specified Latin, Greek, and mathematics.⁴ Newspapers at this early date seldom gave personal items, except marriage and death notices, but this incident was mentioned in the Connecticut Gazette, September 24, 1757; numbered among the candidates for admission was "the Son of Rev'd Mr. Trumble of Waterbury, who passed a good Examination, altho but little more than seven years of age; but on account of his Youth his father does not intend he shall at present continue at College."

One would expect better judgment from the ³*The Poetical Works of John Trumbull, LL.D.* (Hartford, 1820), Memoir, p. 10; extracts from Trumbull manuscripts in Tyler's Literary History of the Revolution, Vol. I, pp. 190-94.

⁴*Works of Nathaniel Emmons*, Vol. I, p. clxviii.

ex-wrestler, but he allowed his son to spend the next six years reading the classics usually read at college, instead of roaming about care-free in the fields and woods, to counteract the mental excesses of earlier years. When the boy entered Yale at thirteen, he was so perfected in Greek and Latin that he devoted himself to mathematics, astronomy, and the few volumes of English essay and poetry then in the library. He had previously made acquaintance with Milton, Addison, and Thomson, in his father's study, and thus laid the foundations for his own literary expressions. After graduating, he remained as "Dean's scholar" for three years, until he won his master's degree at twenty years of age.

The curriculum and educational modes at Yale were passing through a transition period. For more than a decade advocates of a broader spirit had sought to introduce oratory, sciences, and English literature, as Harvard had already done. But Yale, more conservative in both educational and theological tenets, lost ground among the progressive men of the later Colonial period. President Daggett and his venerable advisers were convinced that "solid learning alone" was necessary, and that the new branches, in contrast with the classic texts, and logic and theology, represented "folly, nonsense and an idle waste of time." The crisis came in 1771, when three of the conservative professors resigned, and Timothy Dwight and John Trumbull were chosen as tutors.⁵

In the library at Yale University may be read the first argument in serious prose by John Trumbull in behalf of the cultivation of literary tastes of college students. It was entitled An Essay on the Use and Advantages of the Fine Arts.⁶ The paper revealed a broad scholarship for that day. In a few words, Trumbull characterized sciences, literature, and art as educative agencies. He contrasted the culture of the heathen nations with that of Greece and Rome, and summarized each classic writer of special note in a few, cogent sentences. Then followed a review of English history and literature, from the reign of Elizabeth to the time of Pope and Thomson. Brought thus down to contemporary times, he urged upon Americans the need of culture, especially along the lines of the fine arts. A few sentences will illustrate the clearness and earnestness of thought :

America hath a fair prospect in a few centuries of ruling both in arts and arms. It is universally allowed that we very much excel in the force of natural genius: and although but few among us are able to devote their whole lives to study, perhaps there is no nation in which a larger portion of learning is diffused through all ranks of people. For as we generally possess the middle station of life, neither sunk to vassalage, nor raised to independance, we avoid the sordid ignorance of peasants, and the unthinking dissipation of the great.

⁵ W. L. Kingsley, A Sketch of the History of Yale College, Vol. I, pp. 95-97.

⁶ An Essay on the Use and Advantages of the Fine Arts: Delivered at the Public Commencement in New Haven, Sept. 12, 1770 (New Haven, 1770; 16 pages, 8vo). Copies of this may be found at Yale University, Watkinson Library of Hartford, Library of Congress, and Massachusetts Historical Society.

The sentences which follow are significant, for they indicate the political conditions of the time and predict the part soon to be played by Trumbull as patriot-satirist:

Happy, in this respect, have been our late struggles for liberty! They have awakened the spirit of freedom; they have rectified the manners of the times; they have made us acquainted with the rights of mankind; recalled to our minds the glowing independance of former ages, fired us with the views of fame, and by filling our thoughts with contempt of the imported articles of luxury, have raised an opposition not only to the illegal power, but to the effeminate manners of Britain. . . . Our late writers in the cause of liberty have gained the applause of Europe. Many elegant essays have been produced in the style of wit and humour; nor hath Poetry been entirely uncultivated among us!

In witness of the last statement, and in accordance with the custom of the times, Trumbull closed his peroration with lines of prophecy upon America's future bards. This attempt at verse is weak and bombastic, in contrast with the simpler, fluent prose. One stanza, often quoted at the time, arouses a smile today because of the allied names of the popular poets in that day:

This land her Stéele and Addison shall view,
 The former glories equall'd by the new;
 Some future Shakespeare charm the rising age,
 And hold in magic charm the listening stage;
 Another Watts shall string the heavenly lyre,
 And other muses other bards inspire.⁷

In spite of many flaws and some puerility, this essay was remarkable for its purity and directness of diction, in contrast with the cumbrous, pedantic form of many contemporary writers. That it attracted more than usual interest, at the time it was read, is attested by a notice in the Connecticut Journal, September 30, 1770.⁸ After commenting on the essay as the chief feature of the commencement programme, the editor eulogized its author, but chose, unfortunately, his verse rather than his prose for special praise:

Immortal Pope! thy son immortal see;
 He treads the steps that once were trod by thee;
 All that for future times he bids us hope,
 We see in him as England saw in POPE.

This essay was not the first venture in Addisonian prose by Trumbull. He had written anonymously in favor of a study of modern literature, as a means of creating a progressive spirit at the colleges. With earnestness, lightened by mild ridicule, he wrote several editorials, signed "The Meddler," for the Boston Chronicle, from September, 1769, to January, 1770. The errors of the day in educational ideas and in social standards, as well as the religious narrowness, all came under his censure. To relieve heaviness, he introduced a few satiric sketches, like that of Jack Dapperwit, who had later companions in The Progress of Dulness.⁹ "Wit; True and False," and the abuses of newspaper writing, were treated with frankness.¹⁰ Some of the articles were signed "The Schemer," an ally of "The Meddler." All had the same aim, announced with the confidence of youth—"assistance, (however trifling soever it may be) towards instructing the ignorant, diverting and improving the learned, rectifying the taste and manners of the times, and cultivating the fine arts of the land."

⁷ Loc. cit., p. 15.

⁸ Not November 30, as cited by Tyler, Literary History of the Revolution, Vol. I, p. 210.

The first essay by "The Meddler"¹¹ struck the keynote of the series in a remonstrance against the shams and veneer of life, versus its realities. As an example, he cited the fashion of publication

⁹ Progress of Dulness, etc. (1772); see later pages of this chapter.

¹⁰ "The Meddler," II, Boston Chronicle, September 14-18, 1769. Some of these papers were probably written by Timothy Dwight and other friends of Trumbull, but his ideas and style are recognized in many.

¹¹ Boston Chronicle, September 4-7, 1769.

then in vogue, with a caricature of the author's entrance in a grand "equipage" and heralded by a pompous preface. With ridicule he concluded :

And sometimes for our further information, a curious frontispiece is engraved, containing an elegant portrait of the Author, surrounded with antique symbols, and allegorical devices ; such as Minerva, Apollo or some other of their Godships, standing by him with a label of "Hic est meus" or something familiar hanging out at their mouths.

Again, he was ironical regarding the so-called "gentlemanly qualifications"—extravagant manners and dress, dancing, complimenting, cursing, drinking, gaming, etc.¹² In contrast was the attitude of the day toward the cultivation of a love for letters :

Poetry is indeed much neglected in this age, being looked upon as the lowest qualification of a gentleman. Under this head, as I am an advocate for the moderns, I will make use of the best arguments I can in their favour. It is a well-known maxim that every poet is a fool: if this be true, I believe that no one, who has read thus far, can doubt of our qualification for that office.

Such an anticlimax was often used by Trumbull, with humorous effect.

"The Schemer" delighted to satirize the artfulness of the young ladies, who resorted to silly schemes to captivate the men. Behind clever parody was an earnest remonstrance against the mere "accomplishments" which formed the usual education of women of that period, leaving their minds vacant and fickle. In burlesque, appeared the following "Advertisement":

¹² "The Schemer," ibid., December 18, 1769.

To Be Sold at Public Vendue,
The Whole Estate of Isabelle Sprightly, Toast and Coquette,
(Now retiring from business)

This announcement was followed by a detailed list of her "Tools and Utensils"—darts, arrows, patches, cosmetics, caps, Cupids, and other adornments, "very proper to be stationed on a ruby lip, a diamond eye, or a roseate cheek."¹⁸

These newspaper essays, written while Trumbull was still a student at Yale studying for his second degree, were followed by others of similar tone in the Connecticut Journal, during the spring of 1770, under the signature of "The Correspondent." The authors treated many of the same topics as before, but wrote with more boldness and conviction upon certain other interests of the day, as second-sight, palmistry, the morality of dancing, and the promotion of the slave-trade by "so-called Christians."

Such ventures in authorship, and the liberal, fearless ideas there advocated, called popular attention to the young man, who had amazed New ¹⁸ Boston Chronicle, October 23-26, 1769, signed "B." This cannot be proved to be Trumbull's, but bears close relationship to his later satires.

Haven professors by his brilliant scholarship as a boy. With wisdom, as was proved in his mature life, he chose to study law, since devotion to letters would bring meager return as a life-profession. For this purpose he went to Wethersfield for a year; but the reading of law was somewhat interrupted, for he was called back to Yale as tutor. He continued his studies for the profession, however, and became a successful lawyer and judge.

Meantime the progressive spirit at Yale, advocated by the younger graduates, had gained the ascendancy. The autumn of 1771 found three young tutors at the college, men of reforming zeal and popularity—Joseph Howe, Timothy Dwight, and John Trumbull. The beauty of Howe's character called forth tributes from his parishioners in Boston, where he preached for a brief while before his death in 1775. With less alertness and confidence than Trumbull and Dwight, Howe was a very popular teacher at Yale and awakened noble ambition in the souls of his pupils. The effect of his benign personality upon Trumbull was expressed in the closing lines of the latter's "Ode to Sleep":

Teach me, like thee, to feel and know
 Our humble station in this vale of woe,
 Twilight of life, illumed with feeble ray,
 The infant dawning of eternal day;

With heart expansive through this scene improve
 The social soul of harmony and love.¹⁴

.

During Trumbull's two years of teaching at Yale he devoted himself to both law and literature. His capacity for mental work was phenomenal throughout his life. By the students he was considered a man of marvelous brain-power; but he was also a social favorite. Among the boys he was familiarly called "Trum." In a romance which reveals truthfully the life at Yale during the years just prior to the war, James Eugene Farmer has devoted one chapter to "An Evening with Trumbull."¹⁵ There are also vivid glimpses in this story of popular students like Nathan Hale and David Humphreys. In this fictional narrative the students are listening with delight to Trumbull's reading from two incomplete satires. One of these was The Advertisement of a Coquette, already quoted, and the other was the first part of The Progress of Dulness.

The question has been asked, by Tyler and other critics, whether satire was a natural or an accidental form of literary expression on the part of Trumbull. He once asserted that his native taste was imaginative rather than satirical, and that the latter trend came from the political conditions which confronted and stirred him. Evidence from his literary efforts of varied types, and also from reading some of his keen, satiric pleas and letters, seems to indicate that satire was a legitimate expression of his witty, penetrating mind. Doubtless it was fostered both by the political conflict, and also by his devotion to the English essayists of satirical form. Before the patriotic impulse had awakened within him, he had chosen to write in burlesque and satire. Unlike Freneau, he showed no proof of a poetic temperament, before or after the stress of war and national federation. His work that has lived in memory has been that of the satirist and scholar. His only attempts at verse of lyrical kind were labored and stilted.

¹⁴ The Poetical Works of John Trumbull (1820), Vol. II, p. 120.

¹⁵ James Eugene Farmer, Brinton Eliot; from Yale to Yorktown, (New York, 1902), part I, chap. 7.

Among his burlesques, The Progress of Dulness will take rank as inventive and forceful.¹⁶ This was conceived when the leaders of progressive methods in education, among whom was Trumbull, were trying to overthrow prejudices and false standards at Yale. The satire was in octosyllabic meter, in three parts, published at intervals of a few months. The first issue told of the career of Tom Brainless, a dull lad who had been sent to college to fritter time away upon stilted, uninspiring texts. He succeeded in "hoodwinking" professors, so that he was passed through college and entered the school of theology. With the same spiritless, droning routine, he became a minister. In his pulpit he is thus portrayed :

¹⁶The title-page of the first part of The Progress of Dulness is unique and interesting: "Part First: or the Rare Adventures of Tom Brainless; shewing What his Father and Mother said of him; how he went to College, and what he learned there; how he took his Degree, and went to keeping School; how afterwards he became a great man and wore a wig; and how any body else may do the same. The like never before published. Very proper to be kept in all Families." (1772.)

In awkward tones, nor said nor sung,
Slow rumbling o'er the faltering tongue,
Two hours his drawling speech holds on,
And names it preaching when 'tis done.

The type of the teacher unworthy the name was also satirized :

Then throned aloft in elbow chair,
With solemn face and awful air,
He tries, with ease and unconcern,
To teach what ne'er himself could learn;
Gives law and punishment alone,
Judge, jury, bailiff all in one;
Holds all good learning must depend
Upon his rod's extremest end,
Whose great electric virtue's such
Each genius brightens at the touch;
With threats and blows, incitements pressing,

Drives on his lads to learn each lesson,
 Thinks flogging cures all moral ills
 And breaks their heads to break their wills.

Beside this dull master of the rod is the teacher who was long known as "the book-worm," thus portrayed with justice as well as wit:

Read ancient authors o'er in vain,
 Nor taste one beauty they contain,
 And plodding on in one dull tone,
 Gain ancient tongues and lose their own.¹⁷

The first part of this burlesque was reprinted, in a corrected edition, the year after its appearance. In a preface note, Trumbull explained its purport thus:

The subject is the state of the times in regard to literature and religion. The author was prompted to write by a hope that it might be of use to point out, in a clear, concise, and striking manner, those general errors, that hinder the advantages of education, and the growth of piety. The subject is inexhaustible; nor is my design yet completed.¹⁸

As proof of the last sentence, he published this same year, 1773, the second part of the burlesque. Here the character ridiculed was Dick Hairbrain, antitype of the first dull collegian, but equally familiar then and today. His foppish airs, his feather brain, his swagger and swearing, his skeptical opinions exploited after a hasty reading of Hume and Voltaire—such qualities were delineated with keen, biting sarcasm. The style in this part was more earnest than in the earlier issue. There were lines of moral teaching, mingled with the portrayal of the rakish student:

¹⁷ The Poetical Works of John Trumbull (1820), Vol. II, p. 17.

¹⁸ The Progress of Dulness, etc., Reprinted in the Year MDCC, LXXIII, Preface, p. 2.

More oaths than words Dick learned to speak,
And studied knavery more than Greek.

The career of this young man abroad, his excesses and failures to win respect or success, are told with vividness, until

In lonely age he sinks forlorn,
Of all, and even himself, the scorn.²⁹

To complete the trilogy of characters, misguided and educated according to wrong standards, Trumbull introduced in the third part Miss Harriet Simper, a vain coquette. In a preface the author affirmed "that the foibles we discover in the fair sex arise principally from the neglect of their education, and the mistaken notions they imbibe in their early youth." The same thought was thus expressed in ironical verse:

And why should girls be learn'd or wise?
Books only serve to spoil their eyes.
The studious eye but faintly twinkles,
And reading paves the way to wrinkles.

²⁹ The Progress of Dulness, Part II, "Life and Character of Dick Hairbrain" (New Haven, 1773), p. 38.

To give a touch of romantic unity, Trumbull depicted his coquette in various flirtations; she is scorned by Dick Hairbrain and marries Tom Brainless, to escape the "stigma of being an old maid."²⁰

This burlesque was popular as a production of wit, and it exerted no little influence as a rebuke to the conditions of the time which fostered such drones, fops, and coquettes. The pages contain some pictures of society and epigrams which are relevant today, as:

Follies be multiplied with quickness,
And whims keep up the family likeness.
Good sense, like fruit, is rais'd by toil,
But follies sprout in every soil.²¹

After two years as teacher at Yale, Trumbull passed his law examinations. Possibly in order that he might have a wider contact with men of affairs, he went to Boston, in November, 1773, to ²⁰ In the complete poem the third part reads: "Sometimes called The Progress of Coquetry, or the Adventures of Miss Harriet Simper, of the Colony of Connecticut." In the preface the author expresses his desire "to laugh at with good humor, and to expose without malevolence." Of the young lady's mother he writes:

From whom her faults that never vary,
May come by right hereditary.

The Progress of Dulness, or the Rare Adventures of Tom Brainless. By the celebrated author of McFINGAL. Printed at Exeter. 3 parts. MDCCXCIV. 72 pages; 16mo.

²¹ The Progress of Dulness (1794), pp. 49, 53.

the law office of John Adams. This year gave new impulse to his interests and literary activities. He had taken a mild part in urging freedom of expression in America and had praised the tendency toward resistance. Now he came into personal contact with statesmen who had already shown their radical opposition to the Stamp Act and other measures of injustice. Soon after he reached Boston, the affair of the tea-ships took place, and the military discipline directed against Boston increased the political ferment. All these steps, tending toward independence and war, must have impressed a young man so keen and zealous for reform as Trumbull was. His legal chief, John Adams, was recognized as one of the leaders among the patriots and was sent to Philadelphia to attend the Continental Congress of 1774 while Trumbull was in his office.

The influence of these agitations, and the political principles involved, may be read in the literary work of Trumbull during this year and the following. His first writing in verse, "The Destruction of Babylon"²² was probably only the completion of an earlier effort. With the exception of a few lines, which might be applied to the situation in Boston and the incipient thought of freedom, the poem showed no distinct marks of its author's environment. At about the same time he wrote certain light fables in verse, as "The Owl and the Sparrow" and "To a Young Lady Who Requested the Author to draw Her Character." These are merely occasional verses, with bits of covert sarcasm.

²² This paraphrase of the thirteenth and fourteenth chapters in Isaiah and the eighteenth in Revelations was included in The Poetical Works of John Trumbull (1820), Vol. II, pp. 195-201.

Quite a new spirit permeates "An Elegy on the Times," which was first printed at Boston, September, 1774.²⁸ The author said that it was written soon after the Boston Port Bill. It had a tone of sadness as well as of courage, as if Trumbull still hoped that the worst might be averted, but, if necessary, he would defend his country's rights with his pen. A few stanzas show the deepening zeal of this awakened patriot :

In vain we hope from ministerial pride
 A hand to save us or a heart to bless :
 'Tis strength, our own, must stem the rushing tide,
 'Tis our own virtue must command success.

.
 Then, tell us, NORTH, for thou art sure to know,
 For have not kings and fortunes made thee great ;
 Or lurks not wisdom in th' ennobled brow,
 And dwells no prescience in the robes of state ?

And tell how rapt by freedom's sacred flame
 And fost'ring influence of propitious skies,

²⁸ Published in Boston, 1774 ; in New Haven, 1775.

This western world, the last recess of fame,
Sees in her wilds a new-born empire rise,—

A new-born empire whose ascendant hour
Defies its foes, assembled to destroy,
And like Alcides, with its infant power
Shall crush those serpents, who its rest annoy.*

These stanzas seem faulty judged by poetical canons, but they were superior to the majority of verses of these years. Philip Freneau's best satires began to appear within a few months, but Trumbull preceded in literary evidence of patriotism, combined with keen wit. By his contemporaries he was called "the finest satirical lance of the age," and was urged to write yet other poems for the cause of freedom. He had come into friendly relations with James Otis, John Hancock, John Adams, and Thomas Cushing. The influence of these patriots doubtless incited Trumbull to the burlesque stanzas which were afterward expanded into his masterpiece of satire, "M'Fingal." To the Marquis de Chastelleux, after M'Fingal had become known in Europe as well as in America, Trumbull wrote that "it was written merely with a political view, at the instigation of some of the leading members of the first Congress who urged me to compose a satirical poem upon the events of the campaign of 1775."²⁵

* The Poetical Works (1820), Vol. II, pp. 208-17.

Parts of this satire were written during the latter part of 1774 and at intervals in 1775. Although the first edition bears the date of publication 1775, it was really issued in January, 1776. The bravado of General Gage had weakened somewhat after the evidence of bravery, as well as defiance, on the part of the beleaguered Bostonians. To quell their patriotic zeal and still protect himself, he began issuing proclamations, some intimidating, others with a patronizing note that was almost insulting. These may be found in all the leading newspapers of the time. They gave incentive to the first political lampoons and satires by both Trumbull and Freneau. The former contributed to the Connecticut Courant, August, 7 and 14, 1775, an unsigned parody upon Gage's proclamations, that contains lines almost identical with his later passage in the second canto of M'Fingal:

The annals of his first great year;
While wearying out the Tories' patience,
He spent his breath in proclamation;
While all his mighty noise and vapour
Was used in wrangling upon paper.

²⁵J. Hammond Trumbull, "The Origin of M'Fingal," Historical Magazine, January, 1868; see also letter by Trumbull on subject to Silas Deane, Deane Papers, Vol. II, pp. 88-9, New York Historical Society Collections.

J. Hammond Trumbull, in his study of "The Origin of M'Fingal," has suggested that possibly Trumbull wrote the parody upon Gage's proclamation beginning,

TOM GAGE'S PROCLAMATION,
Or blustering Denunciation, which appeared in the Connecticut Courant, July 17, 1775. As has been stated in the chapter on Freneau, the weight of evidence, as given by Mr. Paltsits, both in his bibliography of Freneau and in a private letter, would seem to disprove the possibility that this was Trumbull's, for it had appeared in Philadelphia and New York papers before it was printed in those of Connecticut.

The first canto of M'Fingal, published in Philadelphia, was soon circulated through the newspapers and reprinted in several editions. It was viewed with dismay by the British leaders, for it was too popular to be counteracted by any Tory satire.²⁶ The second canto came within the year 1776, but the third part was deferred until 1782.

M'Fingal, the Loyalist, is a well-conceived and sustained character. His introduction was preceded by a few lines of general ridicule:

When Yankees, skill'd in martial rule,
First put the British troops to school;

²⁶ The effect of this satire was cumulative. It appeared near the time of Hopkinson's A Pretty Story and A Prophecy, and Thomas Paine's Common Sense.

Instructed them in warlike trade,
 And new manoeuvres of parade,
 The true war-dance of Yankee reels,
 And manual exercise of heels;
 Made them give up, like saints complete,
 The arm of flesh, and trust the feet.
 And work like Christians undissembling,
 Salvation out by fear and trembling;
 Taught Percy fashionable races
 And modern modes of Chevy-Chases;
 From Boston, in his best array,
 Great Squire M'Fingal took his way,
 And grac'd with ensigns of renown,
 Steer'd homeward to his native town.

.
 His fathers flourished in the Highlands
 Of Scotia's fog-benighted islands;
 Whence gained our Squire two gifts by right,
 Rebellion and the Second-sight.²⁷

In contrast with M'Fingal was the character of Honorius, the staunch Whig, generally considered a portrait of John Adams. In the scene of the town-meeting, which has its forenoon and afternoon sessions respectively in Cantos I and II, Honorius speaks boldly regarding the arrogance and injustice of England and her decline in power. Gage had explained to various colonial officers, among them Governor Trumbull of Connecticut, that he sent his troops to Concord merely "to prevent a civil war." This statement was ²⁷ M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem, Canto I, p. 4.

M'FINGAL:

A M O D E R N

EPIC POEM.

C A N T O F I R S T,

O R

T H E T O W N - M E E T I N G .

P H I L A D E L P H I A :

Printed and Sold by WILLIAM and THOMAS BRADFORD, at the London Coffee-House, 1775.

Title-page of first edition of M'Fingal; from copy in Watkinson Library, Hartford, Conn.

used with caustic effect in the speech of Honorius, in Canto II:

There, when the war he chose to wage,
Shone the benevolence of Gage;
Sent troops to that ill-omen'd place,
On errands mere of special grace;
And all the work he chose them for,
Was to prevent a civil war.
For which kind purpose he projected
The truly certain way t' effect it,
To seize your powder, shot and arms,
And all your means of doing harms;
As prudent folks take knives away,
Lest children cut themselves at play.
And yet, when this was all his scheme,
The war you still will charge on him;
And tho' he oft has sworn and said it,
Stick close to facts and give no credit.

In a fractious temper, M'Fingal tries to respond, taunting the Whigs with both cowardice and foolishness. Interrupted by sharp questions and sarcasms from Honorius, he pleads in vain the cause of British justice. At last, recognizing that he is losing ground, he passes into a trance of second-sight, and depicts his vision of the grand rewards assured to the Tories who will stand by their king in the conflict. In the great day of British victory—

Whigs subdued, in slavish awe,
Our wood shall hew, our water draw,

And bless that mildness, when past hope,
Which sav'd their necks from noose of rope.²⁸

By this speech of M'Fingal, Honorius has gained a point—exposure of the greed and disloyalty of the Tories—and he breaks forth into an eloquent plea for patriotism. M'Fingal and his friends find their only resource in stirring up a riot by hisses; and thus ends the town-meeting.²⁹

When this satire, of fifteen hundred lines, was reprinted in Hartford, London, Boston, and elsewhere, it attracted universal attention. In England there was much speculation as to its authorship. It was accredited to Butler and other wits. Some affirmed that it was the work of a British officer who had been superseded in command, and who chose this method of venting his wrath. In the "Memoir" to his Poetical Works, Trumbull referred to the various surmises regarding the authorship of "M'Fingal," and said that there were ascribed to him

Jests he ne'er uttered, deeds he ne'er atchiev'd, Rhymes he ne'er wrote, and lives (thank heaven) he never lived.³⁰

²⁸ M'Fingal, a Modern Epic Poem, Canto II, p. 41. The name was from Fingal, an epic poem by Ossian, published by MacPherson.

²⁹ It was stated that forty editions of the first two cantos were printed. One of the best collections of editions is in the Watkinson Library of Hartford. Several are also found in the Library of Congress, Brown University, and elsewhere.

³⁰ The Poetical Works of John Trumbull, "Memoir," p. 8.

The fact that Trumbull was the author of this satire was known, however, long before the third canto was written. This came in response to a popular demand. There he depicted his Scottish orator as seized by a mob and tried by a hastily convened court at the foot of a Liberty Pole; he was convicted of Toryism, and condemned to a coat of tar and feathers. The illustration of this scene in later editions was rude, but vigorous. In the last canto the once vain-glorious leader of the Loyalists had assembled his anxious, dwindling followers to cheer them with another vision. Meanwhile, the entrance of the Whig forces scattered the company, and the frightened M'Fingal escaped to Boston.

The last portion of the satire was weak, in contrast with the earlier, spirited cantos, although there were two passages of clever construction. The first was the famous scene of the tar-and-feather process, once so popular as a means of punishment. This description by Trumbull was long a favorite "piece" for recital by schoolboy orators :

So from the high-raised urn the torrents
Spread down his sides their various currents :
His flowing wig, as next the brim,
First met and drank the sable stream ;
Adown his visage stern and grave
Roll'd and adhered the viscid wave ;

With arms depending as he stood,
 Each cuff capacious holds the flood:
 From nose and chin's remotest end
 The tarry icicles descend;
 Till, all o'erspread, with colors gay,
 He glittered to the Western ray
 Like sleet-bound trees in wintry skies,
 Or Lapland idol carved in ice.
 And now the feather-bag display'd
 Is waved in triumph o'er his head,
 And clouds him o'er with feathers missive
 And, down upon the tar adhesive:
 Not Maia's son, with wings for ears,
 Such plumage round his visage wears;
 Not Milton's six-wing'd angel gathers
 Such superfluity of feathers.²¹

There is more wit and ease in the second familiar portion, where M'Fingal makes his recantation, to escape from the taunts of the patriots:

I here renounce the Pope, the Turks,
 The King, the Devil and all their works;
 And will, set me but once again at ease,
 Turn Whig or Christian, what you please.²²

This satire, as a whole, may be censured for many offenses against literary taste and many examples of strained meter. It must be regarded, however, not as a finished poem, like Butler's "Hudibras" or Churchill's "The Ghost," although ²¹ M'Fingal, Canto III, pp. 61, 62.

²² Ibid., p. 59.

it resembles these in form. It was a hastily written weapon of warfare. Its purpose was utilitarian and its effect upon the contending parties cannot be overstated. It represented progressive patriotism against reactionary fears. Few writings of that day reached such a wide circulation. It was reprinted in piratical editions until, we are told, it brought about, in 1783, the passage of an "Act for the Encouragement of Literature and Genius," by the General Assembly of Connecticut, which secured to authors their copyrights within the state.⁸⁸

While we recognize the specific aim of this burlesque and its immediate service to patriotism, we still find, within its lines, atmosphere and silhouettes of characters of the past which are well worth remembrance, apart from its purpose. Not alone external pictures of the times are here, but also a clear presentation of the mental processes of Whig and Tory, in the period which preceded secession. If the humor is broad and the words often uncouth, such were the traits of the classes which were represented—the sturdy, uneducated farmers, the rude soldiers, the blacksmiths, storekeepers, and other characters of early village life in America.

⁸⁸ This assertion is made by J. Hammond Trumbull in The Memorial History of Hartford County (1886), note to p. 157, Vol. I.

Donald G. Mitchell has said, with unique appreciation of this satire:

It has a sportive, easy, rollicking flow. There's no dreaming in it; there's no swashy sentiment; it does not stay to moralize; it goes on its rhythmic and satiric beat—as steady and sure and effective as a patent threshing-machine. For an American it should make more piquant reading than Butler's "Hudibras."²⁴

Although it bore such a close resemblance to "Hudibras" that, before its authorship was determined, some couplets were confidently asserted to be Butler's, yet it has a strong individuality. Regarding the method of writing, Trumbull explained, in a letter to the Marquis de Chastelleux:

I determined to describe every subject in the manner it struck my own imagination, and without confining myself to a perpetual effort at wit, drollery and humour, indulge every variety of manner, as my subject varied, and insert all ridicule, satire, sense, sprightliness and elevation, of which I was master."²⁵

John Trumbull was only twenty-five when the best part of M'Fingal was written, and he lived ²⁴ D. G. Mitchell, American Lands and Letters, Vol. I, pp. 158, 159. Mr. Mitchell recalls the popularity of this burlesque in the days of his boyhood. .

²⁵ J. Hammond Trumbull, "The Origin of M'Fingal," Historical Magazine, January, 1868. "Time has a little blunted the edge of McFingal, yet it remains the best of American political satires in verse, with the possible exception of The Biglow Papers"—so says J. Hammond Trumbull in The Memorial History of Hartford County, Vol. I, p. 158.

past eighty years; yet he is known to history as the author of that satire. The later events of his life were personal in the main, and only indirectly associated with political history. That he had a prominent part in the writings of "the Hartford wits," in behalf of internal harmony and federalism, will be indicated in the next chapter. However, this service was done in collaboration, and his special writings have only been partially identified. "The Genius of America," an ode of thirteen stanzas, written in 1777 after the capture of Burgoyne, was included in Trumbull's Poetical Works, but it has slight value either as a historical record or as poetry. His earlier fame, nevertheless, clung to him among his Connecticut friends, and he was generally considered the leader of the patriot-wits of Hartford. With extravagant tribute, Timothy Dwight testified to this leadership, in his "Epistle to Col. Humphreys," in 1785:

Hence, too, when Trumbull leads the ardent throng,
Ascending bards begin the immortal song:
Let glowing friendship wake the cheerful lyre,
Blest to commend, and pleas'd to catch the fire."⁸⁰

In spite of such excursions into literature, Trumbull's mature success was achieved in law. After his return from Boston in 1776, and his marriage to Sarah, daughter of Leverett Hubbard, of New Haven, he practiced law in New Haven and Waterbury. The next few years must have been full of trial, for he was frequently ill, largely from excess of nervous activity. In 1780 he was considered fatally sick, but he recovered and moved to Hartford for his future home. Here he held positions of honor. He was attorney for the County of Hartford, member of the state legislature, and, in 1808, was appointed judge of the Supreme Court of Errors and served until 1819.

⁸⁰ American Poems, Selected and Original (1793), p. 83.

The judicial appointment of Trumbull and his highly-rated literary cleverness aroused some envy among the less fortunate of his political opponents. Evidence of this is found in a pamphlet entitled "Federalism Triumphant in the Steady Habits of Connecticut Alone, or, the Turnpike Road to a Fortune." This was called "A Comic Opera, or Political Farce in Six Acts, as performed at the Theatres Royal and Aristocratic at Hartford and New Haven, October, 1801." It was printed the next year. One of the leading characters is "John M'Fingal, a Poet,—late Student with J. Adams." With sarcasm, the author of this farce depicts Trumbull seeking in every way to gain influence with political leaders, especially with "Jonathan," easily recognized as Governor Jonathan Trumbull, that the judiciary may be increased and his place secured. In soliloquy, he is represented as saying (pp. 17, 18) "I must not dip my pen, until I've got through that judiciary bill,—suppress my wit & satire till that bill is passed, and get the appointment, and then and not till then may my vein of humour be indulged."

A note supplies the somewhat sneering information that, "It's universally known that John Trumbull wrote M'Fingal and sundry other poetic pieces of merit, obtained a law for a patent, for books, maps, charts, etc., has piddled occasionally at Hartford in the New Year addresses of the boys who carries (sic) the papers, and that when elected member for Hartford he assisted Noah in the answer to Hamilton's development of Adams' imbecility. He supposed himself cunning in all writings."

This reference to the assistance given by Trumbull to Noah Webster, in the latter's writing, is verified by a statement frequently made that Trumbull was of great value to Webster in the compilation of the latter's Dictionary. These facts and reminiscences have been given by Trumbull's grandson (Mr. Dudley Bradstreet Woodbridge, of Goose Pointe Farms, Michigan, to whom I am much indebted). Webster and Trumbull were good friends and the latter's classical education amazed Webster, so he called upon his friend to revise almost every sheet of the Dictionary, as it came from the printer, especially relying upon his knowledge of derivations.

Another friend of Trumbull, who won fame, was Mrs. Lydia Huntley Sigourney. Trumbull's grandson has recalled that Mrs. Sigourney was the daughter of a Revolutionary soldier, who lived in a cottage adjoining Trumbull's estate. The little girl, Lydia, interested the judge and scholar, and he taught her many things from nature and books: "seeing she had a natural talent for poetry he bent her mind in that direction. She would write little rhymes and he would correct them for her, and point out all the errors, until she became fascinated with the writing of verse." After the death of Trumbull, Mrs. Sigourney sent to his daughter, Mrs. Woodbridge, a tribute in prose and verse from which the following is an extract, given by Mr. Woodbridge: the poem is a vision of Trumbull in his later years at Detroit.

"To the memory of the Hon. John Trumbull, Author of M'Fingal, and other poems; a native of Connecticut: who died at Detroit, Michigan: a tribute to the memory of one who was no less the pride of his native State than of his Country; the patriotic bard, who having left among his native hills the thrilling Harp which had animated every camp, and enlivened every cottage, till its notes resounded across the Atlantic."

This was he
 Whose shaft of wit had touch'd the epic strain
 With poignant power. The Father of the Harp
 In his own native vales. He seems to muse
 As if those loved retreats did spread themselves
 Again before his eye. The sighing wind
 Through the long branches of those ancient trees
 When first his boyhood lisp'd the love of Song
 Doth lull his soul. There brighter visions gleam,
 A sound of music rises. 'Tis thy voice Connecticut
 As when by vernal rains
 Surcharged, it swells in tuneful murmurs round
 The vine-clad mansion where his children grew.
 But the hoarse clangor of yon mighty Lakes
 Holding high conflict with the winged Storm
 Doth quell its melody.

And is it so
 That in the feebleness of four-score years
 Thou with unshrinking hand didst pitch thy tent
 Near the broad billows of the Michigan
 And mark in that far land young life start forth
 In beauty and in vigor and in power
 Where erst the Indian, and the Panther dwelt
 Sole lords. It was a bold emprize
 To change the robe of science and of mistrely
 Worn from thy cradle onward
 For the staff of the strong emigrant.

.
 Master and friend; until this feeble lyre
 In silence moulders, till my heart forgets
 The thrill of gratitude, the love of song,
 The praise of knowledge, shall thine image dwell
 Bright with the beauty of benignant age
 In my soul's temple-shrine!

In spite of his vivacity and power of accomplishment, Trumbull was compelled to do his work with ill-health constantly against him. He visited mineral springs and gained temporary relief. After such respite from suffering he would work with marvelous energy, and thus compensate for lost time. Among the manuscript letters in the Oliver Wolcott, Jr., papers, at the Connecticut Historical Society, is one from Dr. Lemuel Hopkins to Wolcott, written in June, 1795, which contains an interesting reference to Trumbull and his physical condition:³⁷

Trumbull will, I fear, within a year or two, quit "the visible diurnal sphere." What, then, O Hartford, hast thou for me? Pleasant indeed shalt thou remain, but chiefly for the joys that are past.

Another letter, in the same collection, from Trumbull to Wolcott, has been printed, but, as it is one of the few extant letters by Trumbull, it is valuable as a revelation of his personality.³⁸ Under date of December 9, 1789, from Hartford, Trumbull wrote:

³⁷ Dr. Hopkins was one of the collaborators with Trumbull and his friends, mentioned in the next chapter. The date of this letter was June 28, 1795. It is printed by permission of the Connecticut Historical Society.

³⁸ Printed in Memoirs of the Administrations of Washington and John Adams, Edited from the Papers of Oliver Wolcott, Secretary of the Treasury (1840), Vol. I, pp. 25, 26.

I received yours by Dr. Cogswell, who appears a sensible, agreeable young man, & I am glad that he proposes to settle in Hartford. Indeed our circle of friends wants new recruits. Humphreys, Barlow and you are lost to us.—Dr Hopkins has an itch of running away to New York, but I trust his indolence will prevent him. However, if you should catch him in your City, I desire you to take him up & return him or secure him so that we may have him again, for which you shall have sixpence reward, & all charges. . . .

I cannot conceive what Barlow is doing—After being eighteen months abroad, you tell me he has got so far as to see favorable prospects. If he should not affect something to the purpose soon, I would advise him to write "The Vision of Barlow," as a sequel to those of Columbus and M'Fingal.

When Trumbull was seventy-five years old, and had survived nearly all of his associates in Connecticut, he left Hartford to spend his last years in Detroit, which then seemed on the borderland of the far West. Here he lived with his daughter, Mrs William Woodbridge, until his death in 1831. This experience gave him an opportunity to realize the growth of the nation which he had served in its infancy, and he rejoiced in all marks of progress. When he passed through New York, on his way to Detroit, a banquet was given in his honor by lawyers and men of letters. At the same time his poems, in two volumes, were printed by his friend, S. G. Goodrich, better known to his own day as "Peter Parley." In his Recollections of a Lifetime, Mr. Goodrich thus commented upon this publication:

About this time I published an edition of Trumbull's poems, in two volumes octavo, and paid him a thousand dollars and a hundred copies of the work for the copyright. I was seriously counselled against this by several book-sellers—in fact, Trumbull had sought a publisher in vain, for several years previous. There was an association of designers and engravers at Hartford, called the Graphic Company, and as I desired to patronize the liberal arts there, I employed them to execute the embellishments. For so considerable an enterprise I took the precaution to get a subscription, in which I was tolerably successful. The work was at last produced, but it did not come up to the public expectation, or the patriotic zeal had cooled, and more than half the subscribers declined taking the work. I did not press it, but putting a good face upon the affair, I let it pass and—while the public supposed I had made money by my enterprise, and even the author looked askance at me in the jealous apprehension that I had made too good a bargain out of him—I quietly pocketed a loss of about a thousand dollars.*

We must make some allowance for the usual exploitation of his own merits by "Peter Parley." He was, however, a good friend to the satirist and would-be poet, Trumbull, who sought vainly (after his young manhood) for literary success. The general influence of Trumbull, among his friends of patriotic impulses and literary tastes, must be admitted as his greatest claim to recogdition, beyond the success which he won as author of a single clever burlesque. The face of this writer and judge was painted from life by his kinsman, John Trumbull. In accord with the features there seen, and the traits suggested, is this description of him given by Mr. Goodrich:

* Recollections of a Lifetime, Vol. II, pp. 111, 112.

His features were finely cut, and he must have been handsome in his younger days. His eye was keen and bright, his nose slightly aquiline, his mouth arching downwards at the corners, expressive of sarcastic humor. There was something about him that at once bespoke the man of letters, the poet, and the satirist.*

* Ibid., pp. 114, 115.

A GROUP OF HARTFORD WITS

V

A GROUP OF HARTFORD WITS

Classification is a common substitute for literary criticism. Often a relative convenience, it has sometimes only obscured the distinct traits of an author. Occasionally an individual daunts the cataloguer and stands in comparative isolation—like Dante, Carlyle, Thoreau, or Tolstoy. Classification is often based upon the governing motif of the writers—as the “Transcendentalists,” the “Pre-Raphaelites,” and the “Decadents.” The more common allotment is by eras and localities; the “Augustan age,” the “Elizabeth dramatists,” the “Victorian novelists,” are phrases as familiar as the “Oxford Movement,” the “Lake Poets,” the “Knickerbocker Group,” or the “Hartford Wits.”

After the middle of the eighteenth century the center of literary activity in America was transferred from the vicinity of Boston, where it had been for many years inspired by Harvard College, to the environment of the younger colleges, Nassau Hall, or the College of New Jersey, which later became Princeton, and the College of Philadelphia, which formed the nucleus of the University of Pennsylvania. Graduates of these institutions became progressive leaders in political and literary zeal. At Yale College, also, victory for modern educational methods had been gained, at about the same time that the first notes were sounded against British tyranny and in behalf of independence. John Trumbull was the leader among the Connecticut reformers and satirists, but his life reflected his association with a few companions, often called the "Hartford Wits." While the burlesques and satires that gave fame to Trumbull were written during the early years of the war, many of his later efforts in satire and reform were in collaboration with some patriot-comrades who realized the dangers which imperiled the new nation.

Although independence had been won, anarchy was menacing; government, finance, and commerce were unstable. Such affairs formed subjects for grave discussion, varied by witty verse, at the gatherings of a "Friendly Club" in Hartford. Among the nine names mentioned of those who formed the original membership of this club, there is a major and a minor list: familiar to our ears are the names of John Trumbull, Timothy Dwight, Joel Barlow, and David Humphreys; seldom recalled are their associates, Theodore Dwight, Richard Alsop, and the three physicians, Elihu Smith, Mason Cogswell, and Lemuel Hopkins. Other men, possibly allied with this coterie, were Congressman Uriah Tracey, Judge Tappan Reeve, and Zephaniah Smith.¹ The series of publications assigned to this first group of wits dated from 1785 to 1807.

Seventy-five years seems to us an incredibly long period to elapse between the appearance of some literary work in a journal and its first publication in book-form. On the title-page of The Anarchiad, dated 1861, is this editor's note, "Now first published in book form." Research shows that the twelve satiric papers constituting The Anarchiad were printed first in the New Haven Gazette, beginning October 26, 1786, and continuing, at intervals, until September 13, 1787. They were copied in Federalist journals throughout many of the states of the Union. In this first, belated edition of The Anarchiad, its editor, Luther G. Riggs, expresses an assurance "that he is in performance of a duty—that he becomes, as it were, an instrument of justice, a justice delayed for more than half a century, to the genius and loyalty of its authors, who were among the noblest and most talented sons of the Revolution." We would exchange his term "genius" for "wit," but we cannot question the quality of patriotism and the influence of these satires in subduing threatened anarchy, and in arousing higher ideals during the crucial years after the war, while feeling was strong regarding the Constitution and the basis of political and financial security.

¹ At the library of the Connecticut Historical Society in Hartford are several unique pamphlets, generally assigned to a later group of "Hartford wits," between 1819 and 1830. This group is probably the same mentioned by Goodrich in Recollections of a Lifetime, Vol. I, pp. 92-98. The same phrase, "Hartford wits," has been passed on to another group, of our own day, "Mark Twain," Charles Dudley Warner, Harriet Beecher Stowe, and Rev. Joseph Twitchell.

The name, borrowed from Miltonic Anarch, suggested the purpose, which was further explained in the sub-title, "A Poem on the Restoration of Chaos and Substantial Night." The wits wished to show, with forceful satire, the warfare waged against the stability of the new nation by the promoters of local rebellion, paper money, and selfish greed. Although the papers were sent unsigned to the newspaper, and the various portions have never been perfectly identified, the series was undoubtedly the work of four men who had shown earlier evidence of their patriotism either by service in the army or by their writings—John Trumbull, David Humphreys, Joel Barlow, and Dr. Lemuel Hopkins.

To Colonel Humphreys belonged the credit for suggesting this unique literary plan. While abroad, serving on the commission for treaties with foreign powers, he had shared in the popular curiosity over an anonymous English satire, The Rolliad. Returning to America, he saw with dismay the signs of insurrection in Shay's Rebellion and other dangers. He suggested the use of satire in verse, akin to the form of The Rolliad and Pope's The Dunciad, to arouse public curiosity and also to teach lessons of patriotism.

The prose "Introduction" to the first paper mystified the readers and entertained them. It is an interesting commentary upon the credulity and emotional ferment of the period. The supposed archaeologist thus addressed the publishers of the New Haven Gazette:

I have the felicity to belong to a society of critics and antiquarians, who have made it their business and delight for some years past, to investigate the ancient as well as natural history of America. The success of their researches in such an unlimited field, pregnant with such wonderful and inexhaustible materials, has been equal to their most sanguine expectations. One of our worthy associates has favored the public with a minute and accurate description of the monstrous, new-invented animal which had, till its elaborate lucubration, escaped the notice of every zoologist. . . . Others have spared no pains to feast the public curiosity with an ample supply of great bones from the Wabash, and, at the same time, to quench the thirst for novelty from the burning spring on the Ohio.

It has happily fallen to my lot to communicate through the medium of your paper, a recent discovery still more valuable to the republic of letters. I need scarcely premise that the ruins of fortifications yet visible, and other vestiges of art, in the west country, had sufficiently demonstrated that this delightful region had once been occupied by a civilized people. Had not this hypothesis been previously established, the fact I am about to relate would have placed it beyond the possibility of doubt. For upon digging into the ruins of one of the most considerable of these fortifications, the labourers were surprised to find a casement, a magazine, and a cistern almost entire. Pursuing their subterranean progress, near the north-east corner of the bastion, they found a great number of utensils, more curious and elegant than those of Palmyra and Herculaneum. But what rendered their good fortune complete, was the discovery of a great number of papers, manuscripts, etc., whose preservation, through such a lapse of years, amid such marks of hostility and devastation, must be deemed marvellous indeed, perhaps little short of miraculous. This affords a reflection, that such extraordinary circumstances could scarcely have taken place to answer only vulgar purposes.

Happening myself to come upon the spot, immediately after this treasure had been discovered, I was permitted to take possession of it, in the name and for the use of our society. Amongst these relics of antiquity, I was rejoiced to find a folio manuscript which appeared to contain an epic poem, complete; and, as I am passionately fond of poetry, ancient as well modern, I set myself instantly to cleanse it from the extraneous concretions with which it was in some parts enveloped, defaced and rendered illegible. By means of a chemic preparation, which is made use of for restoring oil paintings, I soon accomplished the desirable object. It was then I found it was called "The Anarchiad, A Poem on the Restoration of Chaos and Substantial Night," in twenty-four books.

While public curiosity was thus assailed, the second, and ulterior, motive of patriotism was emphasized by some interwoven verses. Choosing Shay's Rebellion as a pivotal example of anarchy, the vision of its "mob-compelling," destructive course was outlined by the supposed prophet:

Thy constitution, Chaos, is restor'd,
 Law sinks before thy uncreating word;
 Thy hand unbars th' unfathomed gulf of fate,
 And deep in darkness whelms the new-born state.²

In addition to the insurrections against martial laws and state organizations, there was another lurking evil, especially in New England—the futile paper money, and the consequent depreciation and instability of all industries. Rhode Island was suffering much from this cause, and seemed to be in the power of wary, selfish schemers. In the second and third numbers of "American Antiquities," as the Anarchiad series was called, mock-heroics in verse were mingled with serious advice, in prose, from Connecticut to her oppressed neighbor state. With direct truth it was asserted:

For it will scarcely be denied in any part of the United States, that paper money, in an unfunded and depreciating condition, is happily calculated to introduce the long-expected scenes of misrule, dishonesty, and perdition.

² The Anarchiad (New Haven, 1861), p. 6.

The fourth and fifth papers in the series appealed for a revival of national pride and progress. Hesper, the promise of Dawn, confronts Anarch, god of Night, and by the contention seeks to arouse loyalty among the people:

Teach ere too late, their blood-bought rights to prize,
 Bid other Greenses and Washingtons arise!
 Teach those who suffer'd for their country's good,
 Who strove for freedom and who toil'd in blood,
 Once more in arms to make the glorious stand;
 And bravely die or save their natal land!^a

In the fifth article of the series was an ode, "Genius of America"—a favorite title of the day. In offering it, the authors expressed a hope that, "should the taste of their countrymen in general be uncorrupted, as they flatter themselves it is, they expect this song will be introduced into most of the polite circles of the United States." The author of this ode was Humphreys; for it was included later among his poems. He must have rejoiced—for he sought appreciation—when the song was "introduced" and reprinted. Sung to the tune of "The watery god, great Neptune, lay," it won much popularity; but in thought and meter it ranks among the most inferior portions of The Anarchiad. A single stanza will indicate both form and theme—the dangers which threatened to destroy America's glory:

^a Loc. cit., p. 13.

Shall steed to steed, and man to man,
With discord thundering in the van,
Again destroy the bliss!
Enough my mystic words reveal;
The rest the shades of night conceal,
In fate's profound abyss!⁴

The dialogue between Anarch and his pupil Wrongheads, in the sixth and seventh portions, extorted a confession from the demagogue that his aim was selfish greed, and the enemies whom he most feared were the friends of law, justice, and education.

One of the objects of special censure by the Democrats, who feared the tendencies toward monarchy and militarism, was the Society of the Cincinnati. In eastern Connecticut there lived William Williams, a prominent lawyer, who had ventured to question the wisdom of continuing the Cincinnati as a banded society. Williams was a fine scholar, and had proved himself a staunch patriot during the war, by giving lavishly of his money and service in town offices. Later he became judge of Windham County, and married the daughter of Governor Trumbull. His criticisms of the Cincinnati, however, had aroused Barlow and Humphreys, who were prominent among its members and orators, and they found an opportunity to retaliate. In April, ⁴ Ibid., pp. 26-28.

1786, Williams was a candidate for election, as a Democrat, to the State Assembly. To Joseph Hopkins he sent a letter and an "Address," urging his friend to guard carefully the contents of the letter until the right time for use. In transmission the letter was lost—or purloined—and was published soon after. The result was the so-called "Wimble War," which was waged in the Connecticut Courant during the autumn of 1786.⁵

This intercepted letter, and its author, furnished material for a caustic burlesque in the eighth number of the "American Antiquities." The newspaper stanzas of lampoon letters by "William Wimble" and "Joseph Copper," suggest to us the wit of Trumbull:

Hoping to see you in October,
With face full long, and cant full sober;
So pray be cautious, sly and nimble,
Your loving servant, William Wimble.⁶

After this personal digression, the authors of The Anarchiad returned to more general themes and uttered a strong plea for federalism. With biting sarcasm, they decried Congress, indiffer-

⁵In idea and form these papers of retort were modeled somewhat after the "Wimble Papers" in the Spectator.

⁶*The Anarchiad*, Appendix, p. 109. First in the Connecticut Courant, October 9, 1786.

ent to "Hamilton's unshaken soul" and his wise counsel:

My band of mutes, in dire confusion throng,
Convinc'd of right, yet obstinate in wrong.¹

"The Speech of Hesper to the Sages and Counsellors at Philadelphia" was probably the work of Dr. Lemuel Hopkins. With details of sufferings and scars, he recounted the grief of the war veterans because of political inertia and anarchical tendencies. The last stanzas made a strong appeal for a centralized government:

But know, ye favor'd race, one potent head
Must rule your States, and strike your foes with dread,
The finance regulate, the trade control,
Live through the empire, and accord the whole.
Ere death invades, and night's deep curtain falls,
Through ruined realms the voice of UNION calls;
On you she calls! Attend the warning cry:
YE LIVE UNITED, OR DIVIDED DIE!

The last two numbers of this strange, inchoate "epic" represented a journey through "The Land of Annihilation" and "The Region of Preexistent Spirits." Various critics of the new nation and its poets mingled here with enemies of national unity. Notable among the critics chosen for special mention were Raynal, Mirabeau, and Robertson. Abbé Raynal's open denial that "America had produced a Man of Genius in one single Art or one single Science" seemed anathema to these versifiers, who considered each other men of genius. They poured forth their wrath also against fictitious narratives about America by foreign writers, especially the false and maligning stories of Washington's amours, as told by D'Auberteul. Perhaps it was Humphreys who hurled that last shaft of invective, to redeem the honor of his commander :

¹ Ibid., p. 53. See also J. C. Hamilton, History of the Republic as Traced in the Writings of Alexander Hamilton, etc. (1859), Vol. III, p. 228.

In wit's light robe shall gaudy fiction shine,
And all be lies, as in a work of thine.⁹

The Anarchiad was essentially a literary curiosity, although it had immediate influence upon the policies of Connecticut and more distant states. It is uneven in merit, and often anticlimactic. Probably it was written without any perfected plan, or expectation of publication in sequential form; later numbers were intended by the authors, if circumstances should call them forth. The series corresponded to the more didactic and aggressive columns of arguments in behalf of federalism which were contributed at the same time to newspapers in Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and other states where there was contest over the adoption of the new ⁹*The Anarchiad*, p. 82. The Revolution of America, by the Abbé Raynal, Salem, MDCCLXXXII. History of America, by William Robertson, D.D., Dublin, 1777. New York, 1798.

The Echo.

Printed at the Porcupine Press, by Pasquin Petronius.

Title-page of The Echo (1807); from copy in Connecticut Historical Society Library.

Constitution, in place of the old Articles of Confederation.

The Echo was, in a way, a continuation of these satiric papers, although the members of the Hartford coterie had changed somewhat, and the subjects chosen for ridicule or remonstrance were more varied. The Echo had less significance in the politico-literary history of the age, yet here were satires of strong feeling directed against political evils, and lampoons upon democratic publications. A secondary motive of the writers was to caricature the excesses of literary style found in many publications of the time. Of the group who had written The Anarchiad in collaboration, Humphreys and Barlow were abroad when The Echo series appeared, and Trumbull's part has been questioned. Dr. Lemuel Hopkins, alone of the earlier coterie, was assuredly a contributor to the later series. Associated with him were Theodore Dwight, Richard Alsop, Dr. Elihu Smith, and Dr. Mason Cogswell.

That Trumbull had a vital interest in these papers written by his friends, and was informed regarding many matters there suggested, is shown by a copy of The Echo which belonged to him and bears his name, to be found now at the Connecticut Historical Society. His notes, in ink, assist one in deciding the authorship of certain portions. In the preface to the collected papers the explanation was given that the idea of these word-cartoons came of a moment of literary sportiveness at a time when pedantry, affectation and bombast pervaded most of the pieces published in the gazettes, . . . thus to check the progress of false taste in American literature, the authors conceived that ridicule would prove a powerful corrective, and that the mode employed in The Echo was the best suited to this purpose.

The political evils were also emphasized and the plan of the authors to scathe and correct that hideous morality of revolutionary madness, which levelled the boundaries of virtue and vice, . . . that destructive torrent which threatened to overwhelm everything good and estimable in private life, everything venerable and excellent in political society.⁹

The first "Echo" appeared August 8, 1791, in the American Mercury—a weekly newspaper started in 1784 by Joel Barlow and Elisha Babcock. It was a parody upon a florid report in a Boston newspaper. The latter, in recording a thunderstorm, had used such language as this: "uncorking the bottles of Heaven, revealing livid flame, disploting thunders, amid the brilliance of this irradiated arch!" The wits thus parodied the prose:

⁹ The Echo, with Other Poems. Printed at the Porcupine Press by Pasquin Petronius (New York, 1807; 8vo). The droll illustrations were conceived by Elkanah Tisdale, a facetious miniature-painter. The book was really issued by Isaac Riley, brother-in-law of Theodore Dwight and Alsop. (Goodrich, Recollections of a Lifetime, Vol. II, p. 109, note.)

Even the last drop of hope, which dripping skies,
Gave for a moment to our straining eyes,
Like Boston Rum, from heaven's junk bottles broke,
Lost all the corks and vanished into smoke.

.
The sons of Boston, the elect of Heaven,
Presented Mercy's Angel, smiling fair,
Irradiate splendors frizzled in his hair,
Uncorking demi-johns, and pouring down
Heaven's liquid blessings on the gaping town.

The ornate phrases of Hugh Henry Brackenridge and Governor John Hancock, John Adams, striving to please both aristocrats and democrats, certain demagogues of Jacobin type, a Philadelphia "Mirabeau" who ventured to attack the politics and literary abilities of the Hartford group—such were some of the individuals singled out for special ridicule by the authors of The Echo. Many of the numbers appeared first in the American Mercury, and were reprinted in other newspapers, from 1791 to 1800. In the years that intervened before they were collected and published in book-form, in 1807, some of them appeared as broadsides or pamphlets, generally soon after they were written. Often the papers were intended as New Year's verses.

One of the most representative of the satires, which won popular reading among the Federalists and was printed in pamphlet form, was by Dr. Hopkins, "The Democratiad: A Poem in Retaliation, for the Philadelphia Jockey Club. By a Gentleman of Connecticut. 1795." This passed into at least two editions; it is No. XVIII in The Echo. The Philadelphia Jockey Club,¹⁰ the publication which had roused the wrath of the Wits, gave the example of the Hartford writers and William Cobbett, or "Peter Porcupine," whom they echoed, as an excuse for its attacks upon individuals of prominence among Federalists. Thus, the Philadelphia satirists declared their course of personal attack was "authorized by the precedent of the infamous PETER PORCUPINE and the literary out-law Snub, whose political squabbles have involved the characters of many respectables." In his answering satire, Hopkins attacked the Democrats and Jacobins, leveling his shafts of abuse especially against Benjamin Franklin Bache, the editor of the Aurora, and a grandson of Franklin:

Thou great descendant of that wondrous man,
Whose genius wild through all creation ran—
That man who walk'd the world of science o'er,
From ink and types to where the thunders roar,—
To thee, friend Bache, these lines I now address,

¹⁰ The Philadelphia Jockey Club; or Mercantile Influence Weighed consisting of Select Characters taken from the Club of Addressers. By Timothy Tickler, 1795. Philadelphia. Printed for the Purchasers. (16 pages.)

Prepar'd on purpose for thy hallow'd press,
 I've pick'd thee out because I highly prize,
 Thy grandsire's memory and thy knack at lies.¹¹

After further invective against the leaders of the Jacobinical faction, the author said in apostrophe to Washington:

ILLUSTRIOUS MAN! thy indignation shew,
 And plunge them headlong where they ought to go,
 Then turn thine eye, this mighty realm survey,
 See Federal Virtue bless thy glorious sway.

The next year Dr. Hopkins was again chosen to write the New Year's verses in The Echo series,—“The Guillotina; or, A Democratic Dirge: A Poem. By the Author of Democratiad.” They first appeared in the Connecticut Courant, January 1, 1796, and were afterward published as a pamphlet, possibly also as a broadside.¹² The bald witticisms are recognized as those of Hopkins, as in the stanza:

Come sing again! since Ninety-Five,
 Has left some Antis still alive,
 Some Jacobins as pert as ever,
 Tho' much was hoped from Yellow-fever.

¹¹ Copies of The Philadelphia Jockey Club and The Democratiad are in the Connecticut Historical Society, the Historical Societies of New York and Pennsylvania, and the Library of Congress. Both were issued in Philadelphia.

¹² Another “Guillotina for 1797” was issued as a broadside (Hudson & Goodwin, Hartford). It is unsigned and was not printed in The Echo.

"The Political Green-House for 1798" was another widely quoted composition by this group. According to the record by Trumbull, in his copy of The Echo, this was written by Lemuel Hopkins, Richard Alsop, and Theodore Dwight.¹⁸ With earnest patriotism and wit blended, the verses began:

Oft has the NEW YEAR'S Muse essay'd,
 To quit the annual rhyming trade,
 Oft has she hop'd the period nigh,
 When fools would cease, and knaves would die,
 But each succeeding year has tax'd her
 With "more last words of Mr. Baxter."
 And most of all has Ninety-Eight
 Outstripp'd the years of former date,
 And while a Jacobin remains,
 While Frenchmen live and Faction reigns,
 Her voice, array'd in awful rhyme,
 Shall thunder down the steep of Time.

With unexpected details, the authors of this New Year's message gave specific directions how to avoid contagion from yellow fever, which was the scourge of that year in New York. There was a reason for these references, since one of the wits had fallen victim to the fever and died, Dr. Elihu Smith. He made the first large compilation of American poetry during the summer of ¹⁸ The Political Green-House for the Year 1798. Addressed to the Readers of the Connecticut Courant, January 1st, 1799. (Hartford, no date; small 8vo), The Echo, pp. 233-59.

1793, while he was resting at his home in Litchfield, Connecticut. He thus preserved many scattered verses by his friends and other writers, which would otherwise have remained unknown. Although associated somewhat with the Hartford Wits, he was more closely linked with the early writers of fiction and drama in New York. Further mention of his life, therefore, will be deferred until the later chapters of this book. According to a note by Trumbull, Dr. Smith was the author of one paper in The Echo series, "Extracts from Democracy by Aquiline Nimblechops."¹⁴ He probably assisted in collaborating others.

Burlesque and satire characterize the pages of The Echo, but there are also lines of earnestness, as these in The Guillotina:

Spread knowledge then; this only Hope
 Can make each eye a telescope,
 Frame it by microscopic art;
 To scan the hypocritic heart.

One poem, assuredly assigned as the composition of Theodore Dwight, was a feigned rejoicing at the election of Jefferson. It was entitled "The Triumph of Democracy,"¹⁵ and revealed the feeling of bitterness on the part of the Federalists against Jefferson, with scornful innuendo against Aaron Burr, in the closing lines:

¹⁴ An answering satire to the pamphlet Democracy by Henry Brockholst Livingston, who wrote over the above pseudonym.

¹⁵ Written for the Connecticut Courant, January 1, 1801; in The Echo, pp. 268-82.

Let every voice with triumph sing—
 JEFFERSON is chosen king!
 Ring every bell in every steeple,
 T' announce the "Monarch of the People!"
 Stop,—ere your civic feasts begin,
 Wait till the votes are all come in;
 Perchance, amid this mighty stir,
 Your Monarch may be Col. BURR!
 Who, if he mounts the sovereign seat,
 Like BONAPARTE will make you sweat,
 Your Idol then must quaking dwell,
 Mid Mammoth's bones at Monticelle,
 His country's barque from anchors free,
 On "Liberty's tempestuous sea,"
 While all the Democrats will sing—
 THE DEVIL TAKE THE PEOPLE'S KING!

While we acknowledge only occasional literary merit in the work of the Hartford Wits—and a large part of it has political rather than literary interest—it must be confessed by one who examines their writings in detail that they reflect strong, unique personalities. They have received far less attention than their predecessors in political and social progress, yet they bore a part in the development of an upright and sane Americanism. If Trumbull was considered the leader, as we have said, he had companions in fame, among his contemporaries,—Timothy Dwight,

Joel Barlow, and David Humphreys. These Connecticut men formed a mutual-admiration society seldom equaled in extravagant tribute, which reads like a farce today. Thus Alsop praised

Majestic Dwight, sublime in epic strain,
Paints the fierce horrors of the crimson plain,
And in Virgilian Barlow's tuneful lines
With added splendour great Columbus shines.²⁸

In the eighth book of The Columbiad, Joel Barlow became effusive over the poetic gifts of the Connecticut poets, especially Trumbull, Timothy Dwight, and Humphreys:

See TRUMBULL lead the train. His skilful hand
Hurls the keen darts of satire round the land.
Pride, knavery, dulness feel his mortal stings,
And listening virtue triumphs while he sings.
Britain's foil'd sons, victorious now no more,
In guilt retiring from the wasted shore,
Strive their curst cruelties to hide in vain,
The world resounds them in his deathless strain.

.

See HUMPHREYS glorious from the field retire,
Sheathe the glad sword and string the soothing lyre;
His country's wrongs, her duties, dangers, praise,
Fire his full soul and animate his lays:
Wisdom and War with equal joy shall own
So fond a votary and so brave a son.

.

For DWIGHT'S high harp the epic Muse sublime,
Hails her new empire in the western clime.

²⁸ The Charms of Fancy (New York, 1856), Book II.

The lines just quoted will suffice to indicate the exuberance of phrases, and the triteness of thought, which seem to have been the chief characteristics of the once famous Joel Barlow. Of all the Hartford group he was the most prominent in the earlier years. He was a chaplain in the war, was agent in Paris of the Scioto Land Company of Ohio, and served abroad on commissions for treaties with the Barbary tribes and other peoples. In spite of the popular verdict of his own day upon his voluminous "Vision of Columbus," "Conspiracy of Kings," and "The Columbiad," he will be remembered, if at all, by the simple rhyme of "Hasty-Pudding," written during an hour of loneliness on foreign soil.¹⁷

Barlow's published writings of varied sorts—poetry, addresses, "Advice"—are found at many libraries, and his life has been more often studied than that of contemporary writers and friends.¹⁸

↳ In the Pequot Library at Southport, Connecticut, is a rare collection of manuscript letters, written by Barlow, only a few of which have been printed. The letters to his wife, which form the large part, are interesting revelations of the personality of this man who promised so much and achieved so little, in diplomacy, business, and literature. In the letters to his wife from Paris, in 1789, he describes the Revolution as he has witnessed it, and feels that it is "no small satisfaction to have seen two complete revolutions in favor of Liberty." With frequent apologies for remaining abroad, he explains that his "affairs are still in a degree of uncertainty." The chief faults which his friends deplored were vacillation and a proneness to speculate with money, both his own and that of others. Manuscript poems in embryo, especially inspired by his acquaintance in Paris with Robert Fulton, are found among these letters.¹⁹

¹⁷ Hasty Pudding: A Poem, in Three Cantos. Written in Chambery, in Savoy, January 1, 1793, (New Haven, 1796).

¹⁸ Charles Burr Todd, Life and Letters of Joel Barlow, LL.D., Poet, Statesman, Philosopher (New York, 1886). Moses Coit Tyler, Three Men of Letters (New York, 1895).

After Barlow's return to America, and the publication of his long poems, he expected wide recognition among his countrymen; but he was embittered by indifference on some sides, and criticisms from other sources upon his political vacillation and seeming infidelity. Two of his letters, unpublished and here given by permission, indicate his sensitiveness, and they also show his foresight regarding national evils. The first was addressed to Gideon Granger, postmaster-general, and urged the appointment of a friend to office, emphasizing his scholarship and mental abilities:

* "The Canal: A Poem on the Application of Physical Science to Political Economy" etc. (manuscript).

It is really discouraging to all liberal pursuits, & proves that the government is accessory to the great national sin of the country, which I fear will overturn its liberties,—I mean the inordinate & universal pursuit of wealth as a means of distinction.

For example, if I find that writing the Columbiad,²⁰ with all its moral qualities, literature, & science which that work supposes, will not place me on a footing with John Tayloe, who is rich, why then (God damn you) I'll be rich too. I'll dispise my literary labors (which tend to build up our system of free government) & I'll boast of my bank shares (which tend to pull it down) because these & not those, procure me the distinction which we all desire.

I will teach my nephews by precept & all the rising generation by example that merit consists in oppressing mankind & not in serving them.²¹

Another significant letter was written by Barlow to Jonathan Law, a prominent citizen of Hartford, with political influence in answer to charges brought against the would-be poet "by the malicious hypocrisy of such men as Dwight, & Parke & Coleman":

I know as well as they do that all they say against me is false. All they mean or ever did mean by calling me an antichristian is that I am a republican. This latter appellation they don't like to quarrel with openly, & for that reason they disguise it under the other. . . . But I shall probably never condescend to give my calum-niators any sort of answer. I ask nothing from them, not even to let me alone. Poor fellows, they must live. Parke says individuals & nations have a right to get their bread in any manner they can. And these men slander me to get their bread.

²⁰ See Critical Observations on the Columbiad, etc., in the Bibliography.

²¹ The Letters were dated Kalorama, near Washington City, May 3, October 24, 1809.

I remember to have seen a song in praise of the guillotine in one of Cobbett's pamphlets about a dozen years ago, which he said was written by me. It might have served the purpose of the faction at the time to lay it to me; whatever might be their motive it was a forgery.²²

Timothy Dwight was deeply interested in the publications of this band of Hartford wits, but he did not contribute directly to their writings. He was included in their effusive praises of each other, and his ambitious "Conquest of Canaan" and "Greenfield Hill" were considered works of lasting renown.²³ These voluminous poems are seldom read today, but the reposeful, hymnal

²² This is given in "A Bone to Gnaw for the Democrats, or Observations on a Pamphlet, entitled 'The Political Progress of Britain,'" p. 16, 3d ed., Philadelphia, 1795. In a note it is stated that the song was sung at the Fourth of July celebration at Hamburg, written by "the celebrated Mr. Barlow who was then at that place." The first stanza will indicate the radical character of the song:

God save the Guillotine,
Till England's King and Queen,
Her power shall prove;
Till each appointed knob
Affords a clipping job
Let no vile halter rob
The Guillotine.

²³ "The Conquest of Caanan" 1785 (eleven books).
"Greenfield Hill," 1794 (seven parts).

lines by Dr. Dwight, and his strong influence upon young men in behalf of better citizenship, have won for him a revered name in American history. He was an ardent patriot and a great admirer of Washington. A letter to Oliver Wolcott, Jr., written after Dwight's visit to Philadelphia, in 1793, denounced Freneau and his paper for its attacks upon Washington. It was evident that Dwight considered Freneau's Gazette as a Jeffersonian organ :

The late very impertinent and shameless attacks on the first Magistrate are viewed with a general and marked indignation. Freneau your printer, Linguist, &c., is regarded here as a mere incendiary, or rather as a despicable tool of bigger incendiaries; and his paper as a public nuisance.

A few miles from New Haven is the hill-town of Derby. Here is an active chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution—the Sarah Riggs Humphreys chapter—that has preserved many relics which pertain to the life-history of David Humphreys.²⁴ As a young captain in the army under Colonel Meigs, and later as aide-de-camp to Generals Putnam, Greene, and Washington, Humphreys showed his alertness of mind, his courage, and his zeal for American progress. After the war he was with Jefferson, for a time, at Paris on the commission for treaties with foreign powers, and also served as diplomat at Lisbon and at Madrid. With these manlier traits he blended gallantry and cleverness, which made him a social favorite in foreign circles of society, but which called forth censure from some court-despising Americans. After he had returned to America, he was invited to visit at Mount Vernon, and Washington offered him aid in pursuing a literary plan²⁵ which he had mentioned in his letters, namely, to write a history of the Revolution. At first thought, it may seem unfortunate that this plan was abandoned by Humphreys because of its magnitude. His tastes and effusive style, however, would not have produced a history of permanent value. His biographic essays on Israel Putnam were subjected to severe censure, but they gave the materials for later historians to utilize with better results.²⁶

²⁴ See Chapter Sketches, Daughters of American Revolution (Connecticut, 1900); also Seymour: Past and Present (1902). For editors, etc., see the Bibliography.

In letters and poetic ventures, Humphreys left a vivid impression of Washington's life at Mount Vernon, in the years between the close of the war and his presidency. He pictured him as super-

²⁵ The Writings of Washington, edited by W. C. Ford, Vol. X, pp. 473, 474.

²⁶ An Essay on the Life of the Honourable Major-General Israel Putnam (Hartford, 1788; Philadelphia, 1798). See more fully in the Bibliography.

vising his eight hundred acres of wheat and seven hundred acres of corn, and giving his personal attention to the task of navigating the Potomac, and extending the settlement of the western boundaries of the country. Humphreys was very proud of his friendship with Washington, and often referred to the latter with deep admiration, marred sometimes by such lines of egotism as in this stanza :

Let others sing his deeds in arms,
 A nation saved and conquest's charms
 Posterity shall hear.
 'Twas mine, return'd from Europe's courts,
 To share his thoughts, partake his sports,
 And soothe his partial ear.^m

This soldier-versifier was vain and aspiring to literary fame, but he showed sturdier qualities when occasion called them forth. He took command of a band of men to guard the arsenal at Springfield, when it was threatened in Shay's Rebellion; he served in the state assembly during the years when he was collaborating with his friends in the series of papers of The Anarchiad. His "Poem Addressed to the Armies of the United States of America," first published in 1780, was reprinted in Paris six years later; this sign of appreciation gave him much delight.²⁸ While abroad he lived in a style which attracted attention for its luxury, but which he seemed to defend in a manuscript letter to Timothy Pickering, which I am permitted to print here.²⁹ It was written soon after his appointment as minister at Madrid; he explained the necessary expenses involved in moving his effects from Lisbon to Madrid:

^m Ode "Mount Vernon" Connecticut Courant, October 9, 1786; Miscellaneous Works of David Humphreys, p. 68.

I do not wish to make any unnecessary display, foreign to the dignified simplicity so becoming, in every character, but more particularly in that of a Republican Minister; or to live in any respect in an ostentatious manner; but I desire to be able to live in a decent style (as other ministers are accustomed to do) without being under the necessity of incurring debts. . . . I hope & believe I shall never affect a style of hauteur; and whenever I cannot live abroad without embarrassment or meanness, I shall think it time to retire from public life—for sometimes the embarrassed conduct of a Diplomatic Agent extends beyond his individual Character and leaves an unfavorable impression of the Character of his Nation on the Minds of foreigners. . . . The transportation of my Carriages (of which I shall be obliged to carry four) Baggage, and necessaries will certainly, in the augmented price of forage, etc. cost me a good sum of money—for besides taking with me my own horses, I must order six or seven Mules to be sent from Madrid, and moreover employ a considerable number of common Carriers.

²⁸ Discours en vers, adressé aux officiers et aux soldats des différentes armées américaines (Paris, 1786). Humphreys presented several libraries in America with copies of this poem.

²⁹ Pickering Papers, Vol. XXI, No. 1 (Massachusetts Historical Society). Lisbon, January 1, 1797.

In spite of such indications of coxcombry in Humphreys, shown also in his delight to introduce foreign forms into the President's levees in New York,³⁰ he was a true patriot in his impulses and aims. At forty-five, while abroad, he married the daughter of an English banker, but he was unwilling to live abroad, after his diplomatic missions were ended. As he had shared in gaining the liberty of America, so he wished to help in fostering her industries and arts. While at Lisbon he had written "A Poem on Industry," which ranked with his poem to the armies in its patriotism, as well as its verbosity; Humphreys could not write in simple English.³¹ The poem, however, and his practical success in manufacturing homespun cloths, entitle him to credit for noble motives. He brought with him from Spain, in 1802, one hundred and fifty merino sheep, as a nucleus for his enterprise. Near his Derby home he established a number of mills which made the settlement, at first called Chusetown and later ³⁰ See Jefferson's Writings, edited by Paul L. Ford, Vol. I, p. 216, 233.

³¹ A Poem on Industry: addressed to the Citizens of the United States of America. By Col. David Humphreys, Minister Resident at the Court of Lisbon (Philadelphia, 1794).

Humphreysville, a flourishing village.³² The fulling-mill, cotton-mill, and paper-mill were opened in turn, and employment was given to scores of artisans. He brought several boys from the New York almshouses as apprentices. From England came master-workmen to superintend the manufacture of cloth, which was worn by Jefferson and other statesmen, and which encouraged the growth of American industries.³³

Humphreys was not alone a patriotic manufacturer, but he was also a pioneer social settler. In his village he sought to produce fine manhood as well as fine cloth. He furnished a library and recreation-room for his operatives, led his boys in military drills, took part with them in games, and coached them in rehearsals of various plays and "pieces" of his own composition. One of these, The Yankey in England, was acted in 1815, and printed. In studying the life of Humphreys, we always find many evidences of his besetting sin, literary vanity. He won respect as a soldier and a promoter of industry, but he sought for rank in letters. This he obtained among his friends, and often he was highly praised in journals of the day.³⁴ He cultivated his inferior ³² See Seymour: Past and Present (1902).

³³ Jefferson's Writings, Vol. IX, p. 225.

³⁴ In the Literary Magazine and American Register for 1805 is a so-called "review" of his Miscellaneous Works which is absurd in praise.

talents too ardently, forgetting the moral in "The Monkey Fable," probably finished by Trumbull:

Who cannot write, yet handle pens,
Are apt to hurt themselves and friends.²⁵

In contrast with the admiration which Humphreys craved, and often gained in America, was the frank disgust of Southey. He had met Humphreys at Lisbon, and wrote later to a friend:

Timothy Dwight, an American, published in 1785 an heroic poem on the Conquest of Canaan. I had heard of it, and long wished to read it, in vain; but now the American Minister (a good-natured man, whose poetry is worse than anything except his criticism) has lent me the book. There certainly is some merit in the poem; but when Col. Humphreys speaks of it, he will not allow me to put in a word in defense of John Milton.²⁶

His writings were prefaced by long notes of explanation and tribute.

The poems which are least effusive and offensive in form, among those included in his Miscellaneous Works, were the odes descriptive of the burning of Fairfield by the British, in 1779, and that on the "Happiness of America."⁸⁷ The stanza in the latter which portrays the interior scene of a humble American home in winter may be fittingly recalled:

²⁵ The Miscellaneous Works of David Humphreys, Late Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the Court of Madrid (New York, 1804), p. 228. An earlier edition of poems and essay on Putnam, 1790. See the Bibliography.

²⁶ Life and Correspondence of Robert Southey, Vol. I, p. 269.

The cattle fed—the fuel pil'd within—
 At setting day the blissful hours begin;
 'Tis then, sole owner of his little cot;
 The farmer feels his independent lot;
 Hears with the crackling blaze that lights the wall,
 The voice of gladness and of nature call;
 Beholds his children play, their mother smile,
 And tastes with them the fruit of summer's toil.

During the War of 1812, Humphreys was general of a company of war veterans for home protection, and he wrote, with rejoicing, of his country's victories on the sea. His monument, erected soon after his death in 1818, stands near the entrance to the old cemetery at New Haven, close to Yale University buildings. Its verbose Latin epitaph was written by his friend John Trumbull.

Associated with the men of greater renown in their own day—Timothy Dwight, Trumbull, Barlow, and Humphreys—were three collaborators of less familiar but influential lives—Theodore Dwight, Richard Alsop, and Dr. Lemuel Hopkins. Theodore Dwight, the elder, and brother of Timothy, was a lawyer, and was editor of the Connecticut Mirror from 1809 until 1815. For two years previously, 1806-7, he was a member of Congress. The latter part of his life was passed in New York, where he conducted the New York Daily Advertiser from 1817 to 1835.³⁸ He wrote a partisan study of Jefferson's character, a fervent hymn on Washington, some strong orations and an etymological dictionary. To him we owe the preservation of the long poem by Richard Alsop, The Charms of Fancy, and many interesting revelations of the poet, who was not alone Dwight's friend, but also his brother-in-law.³⁹

⁸⁷ The former poem was written "on the spot" soon after the burning of the town, where lived his sister, who barely escaped (Works, p. 112).

Alsop was probably the editor of the papers known as The Echo, when they were first printed. A letter, in manuscript, from him to Dr. Mason Cogswell is in the copy of The Echo owned by John Trumbull, now at the Connecticut Historical Society. Alsop mentioned some errata and continued, regarding the tone of the papers:

I should be very sorry to have The Echo considered as a party production, as it must considerably lessen its reputation, & any alterations which will take off from that appearance without injury to the object in view, in my opinion will be best.

³⁸ Facts about Dwight and Alsop are in J. Hammond Trumbull, The Memorial History of Hartford County, Vol. I, pp. 157-60. See also the Bibliography.

³⁹ A review of Dwight's character and works were published in the New York Historical Society Proceedings, 1846, p. 13.

Born in Middletown, Connecticut, Alsop prepared for college, but continued his studies at home, becoming a fine translator of Runic poetry, Homer, Ossian, and Molina's History of Chili. For a time he had a bookstore in Hartford, where he lived with his sister. In an address, To the Freemen of Connecticut, (which is classified as his by an ink ascription in a copy at the Massachusetts Historical Society, dated Middletown, September 12, 1803,) he expressed confidence that God would protect "the Vine of this state" against "the rude shocks of democratic violence, nor will He suffer its ripened clusters to be trampled in the dust."⁴⁰

In William Dunlap's manuscript journal, 1797, he mentions a visit to Alsop at Middletown, "to shoot ducks;" later he accompanied Alsop "in a chaise to Hartford where lived, at that time, Miss Fanny Alsop."

In the "Memoir" of Alsop which prefaced his visionary poem, The Charms of Fancy, we learn of his scholarship and scientific interests which blended with his poetic tastes. His sister said: "He seemed to know every variety of birds, and I might almost say, every feather." In boxes of his own design he kept his natural-history specimens—a large collection. His long, ambitious poem on fancy, and its inspiration for poet, painter, and musician, has a few fine lines, and reveals his wide reading and patriotic zeal for America's progress in the arts. The poem by Alsop which seems to me the most worthy, however, was not printed in permanent form, except in collections of poetry, but it suggests, as a forerunner, Bryant's "To a Waterfowl." Alsop's poem was entitled "Verses to a Shearwater on the Morning after a Storm at Sea":⁴¹

⁴⁰*To the Freemen of the State of Connecticut*, p. 16 (no place), 1803.

.
 On the fiery tossing wave,
 Calmly cradled dost thou sleep,
 When the midnight tempests rave,
 Lonely wanderer of the deep!

.
 Far from earth's remotest trace,
 What impels thee thus to roam?
 What hast thou to mark the place,
 When thou seek'st thy distant home?

Without star or magnet's aid,
 Thou thy faithful course dost keep;
 Sportive still, still undismay'd,
 Lonely wanderer of the deep!

Alsop spent the last years of his life in the vicinity of New York. He died at Flatbush in 1815. In his lifetime he was generally known as author of one of the most widely quoted elegies on Washington, and was honored for his translations from the Eddas, and from Spanish and Italian.⁴²

⁴¹ Kettell, in Specimens of American Poetry, Vol. II, p. 60.

The sharpest wit among the Hartford writers was Lemuel Hopkins. He used travesties and imagery which defied all poetic standards. As a physician he ranked among the progressive leaders of his day; in his memory the Hopkins Medical Society was formed in 1826.⁴³ Born at Hopkins Hill, in Waterbury, in 1750, he served as a soldier for a time, but lost no opportunity to study for the profession of medicine, which he had chosen in youth as a goal. After gaining some experience with two noted men of his day and state—Dr. Seth Bird, of Litchfield, and Dr. Jared Potter, of Wallingford—he settled in Hartford, in 1784, where he remained until his death sixteen years later. By success in his profession, and by his courageous advocacy of inoculation for small-pox, use of anaesthetics, and radical remedies for yellow fever, he gained repute outside his state and was often called into consultation. Yale conferred an honorary degree upon him.

⁴² A Poem Sacred to the Memory of George Washington, etc., by Richard Alsop (Hartford, 1800; 23 pages, 8vo). For Alsop's translations, see the Bibliography.

⁴³ A good account of Dr. Hopkins is in American Medical Biography; or, Memoirs of Eminent Physicians Who Have Flourished in America, by James Thacher, M.D. (Boston, 1828), Vol. I, pp. 298-306.

Many traditions and local stories cluster about his personality. He was nervous, brusque, with keen eyes, and a peculiar, awkward gait. One story illustrates his brusqueness combined with faithfulness. On a stormy night he rode four miles to assure himself that a certain remedy was accomplishing the desired results. Arriving at the house, he entered, made a silent examination, refused to speak to any of the inmates, and rode away. He was a dreaded enemy of impostors and quacks. Another anecdote indicates this trait. With Dr. Cogswell, he was attending a patient who was dying of tubercular disease. The sister of the sick girl unreasonably besought the doctors to use some "fever powders," which she had bought from a peripatetic quack. Dr. Hopkins asked her to bring the powders, announced that one and a half was recorded as the largest dose which it was safe to take, calmly mixed twelve of the powders in molasses, and swallowed them, remarking to his colleague: "Cogswell, I am going to Coventry today. If I die from this, you must write on my tombstone: 'Here lies Hopkins, killed by Grimes.'"⁴⁴ In indignation against a "cancer doctor" who had troubled the neighborhood, he wrote the rugged verse, "On a Patient Killed by a Cancer Quack":

⁴⁴ This anecdote, with others, may be found in Charles W. Everest, The Poets of Connecticut (Hartford, 1843). Here are also several of Hopkins' poems (pp. 51-58): "Poland" (1775); "On Gen. Ethan Allen," "Robespierre," "Gen. Wayne and the West," "Lines on the Yellow Fever," etc.

Here lies a fool, flat on his back,
 The victim of a cancer quack;
 Who lost his money and his life,
 By plaister, caustic and by knife.

More dignified were the ironical stanzas, "The Hypocrite's Hope":

He tones like Pharisee sublime,
 Two lengthy prayers a day,
 The same that he from early prime,
 Has heard his father say.

.
 Good works he careth nought about,
 But faith alone will seek,
 While Sunday's pieties blot out,
 The knaveries of the week.*

A few letters from Dr. Lemuel Hopkins to his friend Oliver Wolcott, Jr., are in manuscript at the Connecticut Historical Society; I have been given the privilege of quoting from them. One written in October, 1783, reveals Hopkins' wit and his interest in political affairs:

I thank you for your intelligence & thoughts on politicks; but have not time to tell you my own. But I lament with you the ill aspect of our affairs, and am afraid to think much of the next scene for of late, when I have indulg'd such thoughts, the Ghost of a certain text has grinn'd horrible at me a ghastly smile,—'tis this—

* American Poems, Litchfield, (1793), p. 139; Samuel Kettell, Specimens of American Poetry, Vol. I, p. 282.

"Wo unto thee oh land when thy king is a fool."

In a letter from Hartford, after his removal there from Litchfield, he refers to the American Antiquities (The Anarchiad) as having "given a considerable check to a certain kind of popular intrigue in this state."

During the prevalence of small-pox in the summer of 1793, he wrote to Mr. Wolcott regarding inoculation, which he practiced freely:

This business is much like that of the Treasury Department in regard to existing jealousies, raising party spirit &c., yet, from certain causes, my particular mode of conducting it, in case of any suspicion of wrong measures, does not admit of so unanswerable a justification.

There are some philosophic sentences in the same letter regarding the influences of city and village life, which are interesting today:

The more a man is among all sorts of people, the more fully will he learn the unmeasured difference there is between the sentiments of newspapers, replete with local politics, and the opinions of an enlighten'd people in the peaceable and successful pursuit of wealth & happiness.—I find more & more that a busy set of wrong-heads can at pleasure stir up, for a time, any sentiments they please in cities—and that there is a great aptitude in most men to consider cities as worlds, or at least as the manufactories of sentiments for whole countries—and much of this may be true in the old world; but in N. England the contrary is, and ever will be true, as long as our schools, presses & Town-corporations last.

With his shrewd insight into the diseases of individuals and of the nation, with his urgent desire for progress through education, Dr. Hopkins was a good type of his time, and especially of this group of Connecticut writers. They were earnest, as well as witty; they sought to use their talents for the advance of industry and political sanity. Their writings mirrored many of the aspirations and fears of the period which followed the war and was concerned with the establishment of stable government.

JOSEPH DENNIE: "THE LAY PREACHER"

JOSEPH DENNIE

From portrait owned by his family; reproduced from Clapp's
Sketch of Dennie, 1880.

VI

JOSEPH DENNIE: "THE LAY PREACHER"

Journalism is an altar on which have perished the hopes and fortunes of many. Today our libraries and homes are crowded with magazines of all degrees of merit and ranges of topics. Publishers announce extraordinary figures of circulation of many of these journals; others, of more intrinsic value, perish after a brief existence. The latter fate was the common lot of many interesting ventures in journalism during the earlier decades of American literature. The student who follows the lives of our pioneer authors, from Franklin to Charles Brockden Brown, will be impressed by the many fitful, short-lived journals by which these writers sought to promote literary culture and progress in art and science.

Freneau ventured and lost, both hopes and funds, in his later newspapers, which combined literature with politics. Brown devoted his mature years to experiments in reviews, intended to educate the middle classes and make them acquainted with the best foreign authors, far too unfamiliar to many Americans during the first quarter of the nineteenth century.

One of the most prominent and successful of early American journalists was Joseph Dennie, known in his own day as "the Lay Preacher," or often as "the American Addison." He was born in Boston, August 30, 1768, but during his boyhood his family moved to Lexington. He is associated in literature with New Hampshire and Philadelphia. After studying at a commercial school in Boston, and at Samuel West's school at Needham, he entered Harvard in the sophomore class, in 1787. As a boy he wrote ambitious verses. His mother declared, with farcical pride:

He wrote poetry in early life after the manner of Horace and various other modes but never pleased himself. . . . His father persuaded him to quit a pursuit where he would kill himself with his own sword.¹

At college, Dennie was a favorite with the students. Genial and merry, he was also impetuous and ready to combat any injustice. Once he was absent from college because of illness. On his return, he was reprimanded by someone who did not know the circumstances. Serious differences arose between him and his tutors. He declaimed, with emphasis and vocal insult, one of Lord Chatham's speeches which could be construed as a direct affront to his tutors, and he was suspended for six months. He passed the time pleasantly in the home of a clergyman, Mr. Chaplin, of Groton, who combined tutoring with moral influence. In one of his Lay Sermons,² Dennie referred to this episode in his college life, saying: "I lost my tutors and found a friend. It was like the exchange of armour between Glaucus and Diomede; it was brass for gold." He cherished his hurt pride, however, declaring that the action of the faculty had awakened in him "a prejudice which no time shall destroy." He was restored to membership in the college and his class by making a written appeal for pardon and reinstatement, and suffering a public reprimand before the college. He did not forget the severe treatment, although he made no open defiance.

¹ Sketch of Dennie in The Philadelphia Souvenir by John E. Hall (Philadelphia, 1826). Mr. Hall told here also of Dennie's hatred of arithmetic throughout his life. In mature years he spent more than a day puzzling over his landlady's problem of the cost of seven and three-fourths pounds of mutton at five and one fourth cents a pound and finally assured the lady that "the butcher was doubtless honest and she might safely pay her bill."

His mother seemed to sympathize with his sensitive, fractious nature. She was the daughter of Bartholomew Green, Jr., who had been associated with his father as printer of the early newspaper, the Boston News Letter. Dennie was devoted to his mother. In tribute to her influence he wrote: "During the course of my pilgrimage

²"Interment of Saul," The Lay Preacher, 1817.

I have found many friends but only one mother. For two and twenty years you have been uniformly my guide and patroness." His father was less sympathetic and more thrifty, as was recalled by the son in his sermon "Of Precipitation":

In my boyhood, I remember that a parent would sometimes repeat lessons of economy as I sat upon his knees, and then lift me in his arms, that I might look at Hogarth's plates of Industry and Idleness. On youthful fancy the picture was more impressed than the precept.

After leaving college, Dennie decided to study law. His first inclination had been toward the ministry, but he said he gave up that because of "its starchedness of thinking and behaviour." He read law in the office of Mr. West, of Charlestown, New Hampshire, and thus began association with the vicinity where he was to gain his experience in journalism and his unique pseudonym. With an impressive voice and manner, he was chosen to read the liturgy and lay sermons during a season of pastoral vacancy at the Episcopal church in Charlestown. So well did he please the people that he was given a contract "for four months as a Reader at the rate of 24s per Sunday."

At first he read sermons by noted preachers. Later he interpolated original sentences; and finally he began to preach an occasional lay sermon of his own writing. This youthful service he recalled in after years, in one of his published Sermons:

Many years ago I stood in a rustic pulpit, and was wont to address myself to the few villagers who thought my sermons worth listening to. It was literally the "voice of one crying in the wilderness," for the forest was frequently my study and my principal hearers a gurgling brook, a silent valley or an aged tree. I had but few of the fathers to consult and perused the best of books, not with Poole's, but my own commentary.⁹

He was urged to give up law and study theology. He could then be ordained as minister of the Charlestown church; the parish was willing to wait for him to take a theological course. It is evident, from chance references in his letters, that he considered the subject carefully before he decided in the negative. Moreover, he was much annoyed by the criticism passed upon him by some Boston friends regarding the propriety of his serving as a lay preacher. That a lawyer should officiate in a pulpit seemed to some a questionable practice. Even his honesty of religious belief and expression was assailed, and his first Lay Sermons, as published in local newspapers, were called indecorous, if not irreligious.

⁹ "Design of the Preacher," text from Solomon, 3:2 (The Lay Preacher, collected and arranged by John E. Hall, Esq., Counsellor at Law [Philadelphia, 1817]). See earlier editions of The Lay Preacher in the Bibliography.

Such slanders increased his resentment against Boston, although he returned there for a brief journalistic venture.

While he defied these critics, he wished to vindicate his action to his parents. He wrote to them frankly:

A casual glance on the ecclesiastical etiquette of Great Britain, which the Episcopalians here servilely copy, discovers to you, that a mere Readership does not in the least militate with my secular & lay employments, that it demands not hypocrisy of heart or face but decency of life & such a mode of reading as your kindness, the instructions of Dame Rogers, and the boyhood perusal of your little library have inspired.

With a characteristic touch of egotism he adds:

You know that my natural fluency is such that, when I have a stock of ideas, words of course will follow.*

The last sentence seems to have been true, for he was fecund in words, both spoken and written, in the pulpit, in journals, and at the bar. His readiness with flowery language once brought ridicule upon him in the courtroom. The story has passed down in literary anecdote and may suggest a reason for his retirement from law.⁵ The case on trial involved a promissory note and its requital. In a style acquired by devotion to

* W. W. Clapp, Sketch of [Joseph] Dennie (Cambridge, 1880).

⁵ This story was told by Royall Tyler in the New England Galaxy, July 24, 1818; it is also given, with expansions, in The Philadelphia Souvenir, 1826.

Pope and Swift, the young attorney pictured, with artificial pathos, a home-scene in humble life. The panorama was vivid and glowing: "the taper's solitary ray glimmered," while the "children ran to lisp their sire's return." Then came the bailiff, "down whose hard, unmeaning face ne'er stole the pitying tear." Through "the pelting, pitiless storm the father was dragged to a loathsome prison." As Dennie grew more florid in his harangue, the farmer-judge was mystified, and confessed:

I am in rather a kind o' a quandary; I profess I am somewhat dubus; I can't say that I know for sartain what the young gentleman would be at.

When some fellow-lawyer explained that Dennie wished to have the case postponed, the judge exclaimed:

Ay, now I believe I understand,—the young man wants the case to be hung up for the next term, duz he? Well, well, if that's all he wants, why couldn't he say so in a few words pat to the purpose, without all this larry cum lurry.

Dennie had a keen sense of humor, and he was compelled to join in the general laugh at his expense; but he was disgusted with law in the rural districts and declared that he would make no further attempts "to batter down a mud wall with roses." ⁶

⁶ J. T. Buckingham, Anecdotes, Personal Memoirs and Biographies of Literary Men (Boston, 1852), Vol. II, p. 175.

He had evidently saved some money from his lay-reading and his practice of law, although the latter was not very lucrative nor long continued; for he wrote to his mother, while still in Charlestown:

I am now worth 416 dollars, clear and unencumbered. I enjoy a high station on the rock of independence, unscared, as Pope says, by the spectre of poverty, and I hope I shall be able to walk through life without a crutch.⁷

He had already begun to contribute a column of witty essays, "The Farrago," to the New Hampshire Journal and Farmer's Weekly Museum of Walpole, New Hampshire, which was started, in 1793, by David Carlisle, Jr., a native of the town and a "freed apprentice" of Isaiah Thomas, of Worcester, who had a printing-shop and bookstore in Walpole. On the last page of this little newspaper was "The Dessert," to which Dennie contributed.

Some of these sketches by Dennie were reprinted in the Boston Centinel, and he was encouraged to return to Boston for a journalistic venture. This was the Tablet, a twelve by eight sheet, whose issues as long as life lasted, from May 19 to August 11, 1795, may be found at the ⁷ J. E. Hall, The Philadelphia Souvenir: A Collection of Fugitive Pieces from the Philadelphia Press, with Biographical and Explanatory Notes (Philadelphia, 1826).

Boston Public Library.⁸ "The Farrago" was its leading feature, although current events in literature, politics, and society were recorded. Here also appeared verses "From the Shop of Colon and Spondee." The chief writer of this doggerel was Royall Tyler, who was associated with Dennie under a similar pseudonym in the Farmer's Museum and The Portfolio. Tyler's name is more closely related to the beginnings of drama through his play The Contrast, which is discussed in the next chapter.

Tyler was practicing law at Brattleboro, Vermont, and became a warm friend to Dennie when the latter returned from Boston to Walpole. Dennie was a great admirer of his friend, who was ten years older. Together they planned literary schemes and read classic authors. Dennie was more adroit and polished than Tyler. The latter's humor was puerile, and his stanzas were weak and too alliterative, as "From Fond Frederic to Fanny False Fair." He could write more worthy odes, like one for the Fourth of July, 1799.⁹ The two friends were marked contrasts in looks and mental traits. Tyler, with his plain, stolid face, ⁸ Files of this journal are also at the Lenox Library and the Historical Society of Pennsylvania. It was "Dedicated to the Belles-Lettres," and published by William Spotswood, of Marlborough Street.

⁹ Kettell, Specimens of American Poetry, Vol. II, p. 48.

high forehead, and hair unadorned, was quite different from handsome Dennie, with "befrizzled ear-locks," pea-green coat, silk stockings, shoes with huge buckles and generous bows.¹⁰

Dennie was gay and dilatory; Tyler was prompt and careful. Dennie often wrote his best under pressure. The printing-shop of Walpole was next to the Crafts Tavern, and Tyler recalls an incident when Dennie was forced to finish his "Lay Sermon" in great haste. He was playing cards at the tavern, when the printer's boy came in with a demand for the copy which Dennie had promised. The latter ignored the summons as long as he could, but was compelled at last to yield his "hand" to a neighbor while "he gave the devil his due."

The year after Dennie had failed with The Tablet in Boston, he undertook the editorship of the Farmer's Weekly Museum.¹¹ He was inventive and introduced several features which gave popularity to the journal for a few months. There were political lampoons by "Simon Spunkey," or F. T. G. Fessenden, sketches by "The Meddler," and "The Hermit," and jocose

¹⁰ J. T. Buckingham, op. cit., Vol. II, pp. 195-202.

¹¹ The full name of this paper was The New Hampshire and Vermont Journal; or Farmer's Weekly Museum. A complete file is at the American Antiquarian Society. A Summary of its contents is in The Spirit of the Farmer's Museum and Lay Preacher's Gazette (Walpole, 1801).

verse and prose from "The Shop of Colon and Spondee." Several men in the neighborhood formed a literary club and contributed at times to Dennie's paper. Among the members, beside Tyler, were Jeremiah Mason, Major Bullard, Samuel Hunt, and Royal Vose, the last two afterward members of Congress.¹²

The metrical announcement of the journal emphasized its aims. Its motto was: "Ho, every one that thirsteth for novelty, Come!"

To greet each good and letter'd man,
 A Journal form'd on generous plan,
 None of your dull, mechanic Dutch things,
 But fraught with poetry and such things;
 With politicians, wise as Solon,
 With PREACHER, HERMIT, SPONDEE, COLON,
 With pointed, pithy, pretty PETER,
 Whom ladies called the charming creature.¹³

In addition to the bagatelles and squibs, there were serious essays of educational and literary kinds—biographical studies of contemporary American authors, among them Trumbull and Barlow, and of statesmen, like John Adams and Oliver Wolcott. Extracts from English authors, with comments, were given freely; there was also ¹² George Aldrich, Walpole as It Was and as It Is (Claremont, 1880), pp. 74-82.

¹³ This last contributor was Isaac Story, known as "Peter Quince," rival and cousin of "Peter Pindar."

a summary of foreign news. There was an occasional stanza of wit, as—

Women were born, so fate declares,
To smoothe our linen and our cares;
And 'tis but just, for by my troth,
They're very apt to ruffle both.

The climax of popularity under Dennie's editorship seemed to be in December, 1797, when the editor wrote:

The constant swell of our subscription book suggests a theme to our gratitude, and a motive to our industry. The Farmer's Museum is read by more than two thousand individuals and has its patrons in Georgia and on the banks of the Ohio.²⁴

In spite of such bright prospects, and the fact that the paper kept a neutral attitude in politics until 1800, when it became Federal, the journal was constantly threatened with financial disaster, and Isaiah Thomas bore the losses from three failures within a few years. Dennie, as editor, soon began to make appeals for "punctual payment," adding of the rights of the editor: "Like every other industrious workman, he has a right to bread, and sometimes, to write all cheerily, he ought to have wine."

Perhaps too much of Dennie's time and money went for this tonic to merry writing. At least so the veteran newspaper worker, J. T. Buckingham, relates in citing his experiences as a boy in the office of the Farmer's Museum.¹⁵ Here he was an apprentice at sixteen years, but found that he was expected "to treat" soon after he entered the office. He was "nagged" for a few days, until he conformed to what seemed to be the custom of the place. He said: "I spent more than half the small amount of money I possessed for brandy, wine, sugar, eggs and crackers."

²⁴ Farmer's Museum, December 4, 1797; quoted also by Aldrich, op. cit., p. 80.

Throughout his life Dennie was accused of overindulgence in light wines, but his best friends defended him from the charge of being an inebriate in any sense. In this connection we recall a story told by Griswold¹⁶ about Dennie and Timothy Dwight. It occurred some years after Dennie had left Walpole and was editing The Portfolio in Philadelphia. In the days of limited stage and hotel accommodations, Timothy Dwight, then president of Yale, arrived at a New Jersey inn one evening and was able to secure a comfortable room. Soon afterward Dennie reached the same tavern, but was told that all the rooms were occupied, and nearly all the guests "paired" except the college president. The host was unwilling to disturb so illustrious a man by offering him a roommate, but Dennie begged to be allowed to plead his case with Dr. Dwight, saying: "Although I am a stranger to the reverend doctor perhaps I can bargain with him for my lodgings." President Dwight received his caller with dignified grace, and the two men were soon discussing statesmen and authors of the day, although Dennie did not reveal his identity. After a time Dwight mentioned, among the promising writers, "Joseph Dennie, the editor of The Portfolio, the Addison of the United States, and the father of American Belles-Lettres." Praising his writings, he said: "But is it not astonishing, that a man of such genius, fancy and feeling, should abandon himself to the inebriating bowl and to Bacchanalian revels?" "Sir," said Dennie, "you are mistaken. I have been intimately acquainted with Dennie for several years and I never knew or saw him intoxicated." "Sir," said Dr. Dwight, "you err; I have my information from a particular friend. I am confident that I am right and that you are wrong." Dropping the subject, Dennie led the conversation to educational topics and spoke of Dr. Dwight, of Yale, as "the most learned theologian, first logician and greatest poet America had ever produced. But there are traits in his character unworthy so great and wise a man—of the most detestable description—he is the greatest bigot and dogmatist of the age."

¹⁵ Buckingham, op. cit., Vol. I, p. 25.

¹⁶ Curiosities of [American] Literature (New York, 1848), p. 51, 52.

“Sir,” said Dr. Dwight, with anger, “you are grossly mistaken. I am intimately acquainted with Dr. Dwight and I know to the contrary.” “Sir,” said Dennie, “you are mistaken. I have it from an intimate acquaintance of his, who I am confident would not tell an untruth.” Rising, with dismissal in his manner, Dr. Dwight said: “No more slander; I am Dr. Dwight of whom you speak.” “And I,” exclaimed Dennie, merrily, “am Mr. Dennie of whom you spoke.”

The Farmer's Museum survived its financial crisis in the spring of 1797 and recovered to a new season of favor, as we have shown; but Dennie evidently left the paper in charge of a new manager, Alexander Thomas, and went to Boston for a few weeks. Two letters to Hon. Jeremiah Mason, written by Dennie from Boston in August, 1797, are of interest and value in placing his absence from Walpole, and also as indicating his social tastes.¹⁷ The first letter was dated Boston, August 6, 1797:

From the ennui which you apprehended I should experience in a counting-room I was relieved, the day you left town, by the company of Jos. Barrell and a Mr. Morewood, a youthful Englishman of some promise. But greater things were reserved for me. For at five o'clock I found myself, by Barrell's civility, at his chateau and by his daughter's side. Be assured I was very eloquent on this joyful occasion. . . . But among the many great events which agitate this puddle called Boston, the arrival of John Adams is one. People here tell me it is wise to make my rustic bow to the great man, and I must dine with the king tomorrow and drink some two dozen such perplexed toasts as the bungling creatures here give.

¹⁷ Massachusetts Historical Society Proceedings, March, 1880, Vol. XVII, pp. 362-65.

From the tone of this and the following letter it is evident that Dennie was still resentful toward his native town. The second letter was written August 25 of the same year :

I have had the honor of making two bows to the President and receiving three. About three hundred guests were bidden to the feast, and I am sorry to say that the toasts were followed by clamorous hootings and applause quite in the French style. All this is suited to the taste of the Bostonians, who are unquestionably the merest boys at all kinds of play.

I find strong sense, urban manners, and Elsworth's energy in Cabot. He amuses me by his political zeal, and instructs me by his worldly wisdom. Moreover, he giveth good dinners, and, sinner that I am, I think partridge at least as palatable as politics.

There is here a kind of would-be literary club. It meets each Wednesday, and consists of certain lawyers, divines, quacks, and merchants. . . . They are all lazy; and reversing the ancient rule of the symposium, they convene rather to eat, than talk, together.

On his return to Walpole and the journal, Dennie wrote for its columns one of his cheerful sermons from the text, "Here am I, for thou didst call me.”¹⁸ Emphasizing the good results of his sojourn amid the fashions and culture of the city, he said:

While I was mingling with the crowd on 'change, lounging in the book-seller's shops, arguing in a coffee-house, or chatting with sensible women round a supper-table, I was in fact composing Lay Preachers. The process, though invisible, still continued. I entered hints in my note-book, though I did not expand them in the Museum and kept for future use the fruit of my observations, as my prudent and tender mother used to store for me autumnal russetings to bless my infant palate in the scarce and spring time.

A pointed appeal for subscriptions and payment of the same, in the Farmer's Museum for February 11, 1799, showed that another struggle for existence was upon the journal. As a venture it appeared in a more ornate and expanded form, April 1, 1799. For this issue Dennie wrote a clever remonstrance against the silly tricks of "All Fools' Day," then so commonly played. He inquired: "Why mankind are so anxious to form fools when the business seems to be fully done?" With evidence of his own love of nature, he advised:

This day should indeed be a festal one but not dedicated to "idiot laughter" and the petty tricks of childhood. It should be a kind of vernal thanksgiving. The goddess, Flora, rather than Folly, should have our vows.

¹⁸ He used the same text for a later sermon while editing The Portfolio.

In spite of the discouragements and financial losses which Dennie shared with his partners in the vacillating fortunes of this journal, he gained some returns in fame and money from publishing at the same press, in 1796, the first volume of The Lay Preacher.¹⁹ In a sentimental preface to these collected "sermons" he outlined his aim and his literary hopes :

To instruct the villager, was his primary object. Hence, an easy and obvious stile was indispensable. To rise to the gorgeous phrase of BOLINGBROKE would have been absurd, to sink to the vulgarity of L'ESTRANGE would have been ignominious. The familiarity of FRANKLIN'S manner, and the simplicity of STERNE'S proved most auxiliary to his design. He therefore, adventured their union. Diffident of success, and prepared for censure, he will not be surprised at a harsh sentence from the critical tribunal. The vanity of authorship has already caused him to prove the negligence of his NATAL TOWN; the same passion now urges him to try suffrages of his COUNTRY. Should this, like the former attempts, slide rapidly down the slope of oblivion, it will add the last item to the catalogue of literary disappointments and CURE THE AUTHOR.

Through the circulation of this volume, and of the journals where his contributions had appeared, Dennie had won considerable reputation for mental alertness and a fluent style, according to the tastes of that day. He was offered positions in journalism in New York and Philadelphia, and possibly elsewhere. He hoped to go from New Hampshire to Congress, but failed to win in the election. While he was debating with himself which place he should choose as editor, another opportunity came, which combined a larger, assured salary with a good opportunity to wield both political and literary influence. This was an offer to become private secretary to Timothy Pickering, then secretary of state. The correspondence which led to the acceptance of this position by Dennie, affording revelations of his egotism and flowery language, is still extant, and is printed by permission.²⁰

¹⁹ The Lay Preacher; or, Short Sermons for Idle Readers (Walpole, 1796; 132 pages, 16mo); Preface, pp. iii, iv.

The first letter was from Dennie to Lewis R. Morris, from Walpole, February 10, 1799. After thanking his friend for recommending him to the Department of State, he explains his unfitness for any other departments:

My talents are not warlike, and Mr. McHenry would find me a miserable tactician. The meanest clerk in the office of Wolcott,²¹ would detect and deride my fiscal inability; and I am too much of a landsman to comprehend the nautical lore of Stoddert. . . . If I enter into the service of government I expect that exertion will be required, and I am willing to make it. Considering this as a stepping-stone to views more enlarged and ambitious, I am abundantly sensible that these will never be gratified, without a satisfactory fulfilment of my initial tasks. With characteristic vanity, he asks to be called "confidential secretary," saying:

²⁰ These letters are in the Massachusetts Historical Society; the Pickering Papers, Vol. X, No. 644; Vol. XXIV, Nos. 45, 275, 287; Vol. XIII, No, 537.

²¹ References here are to the secretaries of war, the treasury, and the navy at that time. Pickering Papers, Vol. XXIV, No. 45.

The term clerk is hardly soothing enough to my pride; it might disgust that of my family; and you, in your noble spirit of candour, will forgive, what only wears the appearance of dictation, and results from my well-known love to whatever has gloss, and some sort of high colouring about it.

The second letter in the series is from Timothy Pickering to Lewis R. Morris, Esq., dated Philadelphia, April 29, 1799:

I have just received your letter of the 21st respecting Mr. Dennie. I have room for him in my office and shall now be glad to employ him. If with his genius and taste, he can in a sufficient degree relinquish the pursuits of literature, and submit to the drudgery of business, it will give me much pleasure to have been in any degree instrumental in availing the public of the benefit of his talents. His compensation may be eight hundred, or a thousand dollars a year, according to the time his health (which I understood you was delicate) may permit him to apply to the public service.

It seems as if Dennie was very dilatory after receiving the first letter from Pickering, just quoted, both in his answer and also in arrangements for moving to Philadelphia. His reasons were almost hidden under the verbiage of the two letters which he wrote to Pickering, May 26, 1799, and June 1, 1799. In the first he accepts the position with effusion and announces that he will go "expeditiously," but adds, in apparent contradiction of the last word:

But, as my health is not confirmed, and as I cannot definitely ascertain the number of days, business here and a parent's tenderness, at home, may detain me, you will permit me, Sir, to apprise you, by no very distant post, of the time, when I shall have the pleasure of hearing and obeying your official commands.

In the second letter he asks for further extension of time, because he feels that he must give three months' notice to the printers of the Farmer's Museum, saying: "Good faith obliges me to comply entirely with the spirit of my promise."

The result of Dennie's service in the office of Pickering may be best revealed in a letter from the latter to John Marshall, about a year after the above correspondence.²² One is not surprised to read here the criticisms on Dennie's efficiency as a clerk:

Mr. Dennie. will have the honor to present to you this letter. Desirous of being at the seat of government, and to be relieved from the drudgery of editing a newspaper for a very inadequate compensation, his friend Gen'l Morris recommended him for a place in the department of State. But I cannot, because I ought not, to conceal from you, that Mr. Dennie's habits and literary turn—I should rather say, his insatiable appetite for knowledge, useful as well as ornamental, render his service as a clerk less productive than the labours of many dull men.

²² Letter dated June 27, 1800 (Pickering Papers, Vol. XIII, No. 557).

He still wishes, however, to renew his attendance in the department of State, to make a fresh essay to serve his country, provide for his own support, and promote his ultimate views of rendering, in another line, more important benefits to his fellow citizens and to mankind. He therefore, being a perfect Stranger to you, has asked of me a letter of introduction. You will be gratified by the proofs he will give you of an enlightened mind, and with his admirable manners; and I am sure you will be inclined to the most liberal indulgence of his laudable proposition.

After reading this last letter, one can better understand why, in the latter part of 1800, Dennie again turned to journalism for his income, establishing in December of that year a new journal in Philadelphia, The Portfolio. He was joined in this enterprise by Asbury Dickens. He had continued his contributions of occasional sermons to the Farmer's Museum, and had written editorials for Fenno's Gazette of the United States, the Federal organ which had survived and gained in favor, after its experience as a rival of Freneau's National Gazette. Dennie modeled his new paper after The Tablet, the early Boston venture, but The Portfolio was long-lived and existed, in varied forms, from 1801 to 1827.²³ The motto, chosen from Cowper, might well apply to all journalistic efforts of that age:

Various,—that the mind
Of desultory man, studious of change,
And pleas'd with novelty, may be indulg'd.

A large sheet of "Announcement" accompanied the first number:

A YOUNG MAN, once known among village-readers, as the humble historian of the hour, the conductor of a Farmers Museum and a Lay Preacher's Gazette, again offers himself to the public as a volunteer editor. Having, as he conceives, a right to vary, at pleasure, his fictitious name he now, for higher reasons than any fickle humour might dictate, assumes the appellation of OLD SCHOOL. Fond of this title, indicative of his moral, political and literary creed, he proposes publishing every Saturday, on a super-royal quarto sheet

A NEW WEEKLY PAPER to be called
THE PORT FOLIO
by Oliver Oldschool, Esq.

He commented on the Lilliputian page as an experiment, like that of "a saving grocer, who gives of his goods only a small sample," and declared his purpose to offer "something tolerable on political, literary, and transient topics and something auxiliary to sound principles which, after church, 'retired leisure' may read on Sunday."

²³ From 1801 to 1808 the Portfolio was a weekly; from 1809 to 1818 it was a monthly; in later years its publication was generally as a monthly or a quarterly. Files of this journal are found at many libraries throughout the country; perfect files are in Philadelphia and New York. Nicholas Biddle succeeded Dennie as editor.

Although this journal was essentially designed as a literary organ, it was strongly Federalist, and was disliked and parodied by Jefferson's friends as the "Portable Foolery."²⁴ During the first two years Dennie criticized Jefferson freely and indulged in strictures even upon the Declaration of Independence. For such fearless politics he was arrested and charged, in 1804, with being the editor of "a seditious publication against the government." He was acquitted, but the tone of his journal henceforth was less virulent. He was a pronounced Federalist or Republican from his youth, and would not listen to any enticing offers to edit Democratic newspapers. He was once offered a large salary to edit the Independent Chronicle of Boston, but refused, expressing his convictions in extravagant language, thus:

If he had offered me $120,000,000 annually to conduct a Democratic paper, I must have refused the offer. It would have belied my feelings, my habits, my principles, my conscience. I should have been an infinite apostate.²⁵

Dennie was a social favorite in Philadelphia

²⁴ See Scharf and Westcott, History of Philadelphia (Philadelphia, 1884), Vol. I, pp. 508, 509.

²⁵ W. W. Clapp, Sketch of Dennie, 1882.

from the first days there. He was instrumental in forming the Tuesday Club, a social organization with literary aims. He was a fine storyteller, and was in demand for convivial occasions wherever he might be. One of the vivid pictures of Dennie, as a companion, is given by Josiah Quincy, of Boston,²⁸ who was a college classmate of Dennie and a friend throughout life. Speaking of Dennie's mental equipment, as compared with that of other classmates, this friend said:

The most talented, taking light literature as the standard, was Joseph Dennie, whose acquaintance with the best English classics was uncommon at that period. His imagination was vivid, and he wrote with great ease and felicity. . . . While at college he might unquestionably have taken the highest rank in his class, for he had great happiness both in writing and elocution; but he was negligent in his studies and not faithful to the genius with which nature had endowed him.

In reminiscence of his father's conversations regarding Dennie, Edmund Quincy wrote:

Mr. Dennie was a most charming companion, brilliant in conversation, fertile in allusion and quotation, abounding in wit, quick at repartee, and of only too jovial a disposition. My father used to tell of the gay dinners which celebrated the not infrequent visits Mr. Dennie made him when he was keeping house with his mother. On these white days he would summon the flower of the youth of ²⁸ Life of Josiah Quincy, by his son, Edmund Quincy (Boston, 1867), p. 30.

Boston to enjoy the society of their versatile friend, and the festivity which set in at the sober hour of two would reach far into the night before the party were willing to break up.

When The Portfolio was established, Dennie summoned all his friends with literary tastes to contribute, and the columns of the journal, if carefully studied, reveal some interesting writers and men of prominence in affairs and science. General Thomas Cadwallader wrote translations from Horace; Joseph Hopkinson contributed both prose and verse; Charles Brockden Brown and his brother-in-law, John Blair Linn, were among the writers whose authorship can be attested. Gouverneur Morris, Samuel Ewing, and Mrs. Sarah E. Hall were other writers of the day who assisted Dennie. Josiah Quincy contributed a series of papers, signed "Climenole," satirical and spicy; their authorship was long a secret.²⁷ As in previous ventures, Dennie had support from "The Shop of Colon and Spondee;" other writers contributed more serious reviews and accounts of travels. Among the latter sort were "Letters from Silesia," found in earlier issues of The Portfolio. These letters were by John Quincy Adams, who was then traveling abroad with his wife, on account of the latter's ill health. The letters came into Dennie's possession in a peculiar way.²⁸ They were written to the brother of Mr. Adams in Philadelphia. He was a friend of Dennie, and the latter, when allowed to read the letters, was so delighted that he begged to include them unsigned in his journal. The owner consented, and they appeared in twenty-nine numbers, forming an interesting feature of The Portfolio. At first the writer of the letters did not know of their use; later he was powerless or unwilling to interfere. They became so popular that an unknown individual reprinted them in London, for his own profit, in 1804, and three years later they were translated into German and French.

²⁷ Op. cit., p. 33.

Among the Adams papers, owned by Charles Francis Adams, are two unpublished letters from Dennie to John Quincy Adams, which I have been permitted to use. The first, dated September 17, 1804, refers to the London publication of these Letters. It is in Dennie's usual fluent and obsequious style:

I perceive by the Public papers, that "Letters from Silesia," &c., have been published in your name in the city of London. You will add to those numerous acts of kindness, with which you have often obliged and honoured me, if by the return of Post, you will mention whether this book has been thus printed with your consent. Your correspondence with the Port Folio has been for some time, relinquished. Be assured, Sir, I employ no false, or dissembling compliment, when I express the delight I feel in perusing any of your literary productions, and my sorrow that any cause should for a single week, deprive me of the valued assistance of a classical coadjutor.

²⁸ See Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, edited by Charles Francis Adams (Philadelphia, 1877), Vol. I, p. 240, 241.

Whatever you choose to write for my Journal, I will always promptly impart to the Public. I inhibit no topics, I suggest no style; but I intreat that you will still continue to benefit me, by the dictates of your Judgement, and the productions of your Taste.

The second letter was in answer to a word of remonstrance from John Quincy Adams against the publication, in The Portfolio, of such unreliable, inferior articles as a series entitled "The British Spy," which had appeared during the autumn of this same year, 1804.²⁹ The letters had some gossipy passages, designed to ferment political feeling regarding Theophilus Parsons, as tool of a junto and of John Adams. Dennie has made the only defense that I have found in this interesting letter to Mr. Adams:

My dear Friend.

A bundle of lucubrations with the title of the "British Spy," was left at my lodgings, by some person unknown. They were inclosed in a letter, without a signature, and I was requested to give them a place in the Port Folio.

²⁹ See the Portfolio, Letter II, November 10, 1804. The inference was that Parsons refused the appointment offered by John Adams. In a note, after Letter IV, November 24, 1804, Dennie urged the writer to verify his statements, corrected this special one, but praised the letters. There were no more, however.

Occupied with the care of an edition of Shakespeare, and of Sir W. Jones, the only paper I perused was the first of the Series. Though I was offended by the tumid and Asiatic stile, which the anonymous author thought proper to employ, I thought it would not be disagreeable to the Public, and possibly might be pleasant to the Bostonians, if I gave a place to what from a very cursory glance, I deemed not dishonourable to my native town.

The second letter containing the offensive paragraph, of which you so justly complain, was not perused by me, until after publication. The instant that I read it, and some days prior to the receipt of your letter of expostulation, although I did not know with precision, the state of facts, I deemed the paragraph a gossiping anecdote of Jacobinical origin, I estimated it as a lye, accordingly, and resolved, at the end of the series, hitherto received, which will be printed, on the Saturday of the current week, to express my frank opinion of the falsity of the article, and to warn the author against hazarding such random calumny. I feel with very acute sensibility wounded, that you should suppose for an instant, that I could willingly lend a lye the confidence of Truth. If you knew me more intimately you would very distinctly perceive that I was never found to retail Scandal for any individual, or any Junto; and that though I have lived more than Thirty years in a Republic, I have not yet learned to be ungrateful to those who have showed me kindness.

Within the columns of The Portfolio were selected passages from contemporary English writers of both prose and verse, with interpretative comments. On December 19, 1801, as an example appeared Wordsworth's "Lucy Gray" and "Eglantine," with praises for "the genuine poet who has forsaken the necromantic realms of German extravagance, and the torrid zone of Della Cruscan ardour and has recalled erring readers from sounds to things, from fancy to the heart." What a pity that Dennie could not have applied to his own style some of the Wordsworthian simplicity and clearness!

The visit of Thomas Moore to Philadelphia, in the spring of 1812, was an event of great significance in the life of Dennie. Moore's grateful memories of this American writer are almost the only words of recognition given to Dennie by any author outside the narrow circle of his friends. Moore had been disappointed in his reception at New York and Washington, but the cordiality with which he was greeted by Dennie and his coterie did much to soften his bitterness. Not alone was he fêted during the few days of his stay in Philadelphia, but his coming was heralded in The Portfolio for some weeks before his arrival. As early as April 21, 1804, Moore's poem "To Julia"—one of many of this title—was printed with the note of praise for "this recent poet who is much admired in England for the singular sweetness of his versification, and for a certain glow in his descriptions, mildly ardent, like the setting suns of Claude." True to his promise, in another issue Dennie selected many examples of Moore's poems, especially from the translations of Anacreon.³⁰

Moore appreciated his attentions in Philadelphia, in June, 1804. To Dennie's journal he contributed freely many of the poems, which appeared later in English magazines, but were printed here first, often with the prefatory words, "Printed from the Author's Manuscript." In The Portfolio for July 14 is "A Birthday Song" by Moore which refers to these cordial, new-found friends:

In every eye around I mark,
The feelings of the heart o'erflowing;
From every soul I catch the spark
Of sympathy, in friendship flowing.

More familiar, as testimony by Moore, are his "Lines on Leaving Philadelphia," which were sent in a letter to Dennie, July 2, 1804, and first printed in his journal. The poem was dedicated to Mrs. Joseph Hopkinson, whose sympathetic singing of Moore's songs had assured him, though a stranger, that—

The lays of his boyhood had stol'n to their ear,
And they loved what they knew of so humble a name;
And they told him, with flattery, welcome and dear,
That they found in his heart something better than fame.

.....
³⁰ Copies of The Portfolio from April to September, 1804, contain many of Moore's poems, with comment, as "The Wedding Ring," "To the Invisible Girl," "Rondeau," "Written in a Common-Place Book," and many poems "To Julia."

The stranger is gone—but he will not forget,
 When at home he shall talk of the toils he has known,
 To tell, with a sigh, what endearments he met.
 As he stray'd by the wave of the Schuylkill alone.²¹

Moore kept his pledge of remembrance. He wrote his mother about his Philadelphia friends and gave them special mention in the metrical "Letter to the Hon. W. R. Spencer," where he extolled ye sacred few,

 Whom late by Delaware's green banks I knew;
 Whom, known and loved through many a social eve,
 'Twas bliss to live with and 'twas pain to leave.
 Not with more joy the lonely exile scann'd
 The writing traced upon the desert's sand,
 Where his lone heart but little hop'd to find
 One trace of life, one stamp of human kind,
 Than did I hail the pure, th' enlightened zeal,
 The strength to reason, and the warmth to feel,
 The manly polish and th' illumined taste,
 Which—mid the melancholy, heartless waste
 My foot has travers'd,—oh, ye sacred few!
 I found by Delaware's green banks with you.

To his mother, Moore wrote of his reception in Philadelphia: "It is the only place in America which can boast any literary activity."²² In the ²¹ This poem, in Moore's handwriting, and two letters by him to Dennie are owned by Mrs. Oliver Hopkinson. They were printed in the Critic, June, 1888.

²² Memoirs, Journals and Correspondence of Thomas Moore (London, 1856), Vol. I, p. 164.

same vein of unjust criticism, but flattering experience, he said in the appendix to his poems :

In the society of Mr. Dennie and his friends at Philadelphia, I passed the few agreeable moments which my tour through the states afforded me. Mr. Dennie has succeeded in diffusing through this cultivated little circle that love for good literature and sound politics which he feels so zealously himself and which is very rarely the characteristic of his countrymen.

Among other allusions in Moore's letters to his mother is one to "two or three little poems of a flattering kind" which were addressed to him in Philadelphia. These may be found in The Portfolio for September 8, 22, and 29, 1804. The third was an ambitious ode, sung at a dinner to Moore just as he was leaving the city. In mock-heroic verse, the gods are represented in conclave over the seeming dulness of earth, and the need of some new spirit of poetry to waken man, as did Anacreon of old. To their suggestions Jupiter replies in the concluding stanza :

I love well these mortals, though sometimes they err,
And blessings abundant upon them will pour;
The promise thus made, not an instant defer,
You ask for Anacreon, but I will give MOORE.*

By inheritance Dennie had slight endurance, and his life of conviviality, while it never became debauchery, tended to reduce his vigor. Without the restraints or the comforts of a home-life, he was careless and irregular in his hours of meals and sleep, and often seemed desperate to snatch all the zestful pleasures which he could. The inevitable day of reckoning came, and he died in January, 1812, when only forty-three years old. Various eulogistic paragraphs appeared soon after his death in the press of Philadelphia and New York. His own journal devoted much space to a "Mortuary,"⁸⁴ appended to the February number. A poem, full of absurd over-praise and strained meters, was followed by a prose eulogy somewhat less extravagant, in which his personal traits and his aim throughout life were duly emphasized. Of the former the writer said:

* These poems were signed "Mercutio" and C. H—d.

So full of urbanity and gentleness were his manners—so amiable his deportment, that none could approach, without loving a man from whom there never escaped an unkind expression—who, in his graver mood, was an instructive friend, and in his social hours, a most gay and captivating companion.

The chief motive of his life was recalled, in language too ornate to be effective, but with truth in the thought:

The great purpose of all his exertions, the uniform pursuit of his life, was to disseminate among his countrymen a taste for elegant literature, to give to education and to letters their proper elevation in the public esteem, and reclaiming the youth of America from the low career of sordid interests to fix steadfastly their ambition on objects of a more exalted character. In this honourable enterprize, he stood at first almost alone. But such is the power of a single mind in awakening the talents of a whole nation, so easily may the pliant materials of public opinion be moulded by the plastic hand of genius, that the establishment of his work may be considered as forming an æra in the literary history of America.⁸⁵

⁸⁴ The Portfolio, February, 1812; 12 pages with black border, signed "A." Possibly this was Paul Allen, who was associated with Dennie during the last months of his editorship. Premonitions of Dennie's illness and death were in the last volume of The Portfolio which he edited.

Six years after the death of Dennie an admiring friend tried to publish a series of New and Original Lay Sermons,⁸⁶ collected from his writings in The Portfolio. The avowed purpose was to get money for a monument. The price was to be five cents a copy, or two dollars a year. The first sermon chosen was one of his boldest in theme, from the text II Sam. 6:20—the unique explanation of the treatment of Michal by David. Whether because of this unfortunate initial “sermon,” or for some other reason, the scheme did not succeed. The monument was erected later by friends, but the failure of this series was symbolized in the bizarre illustration at the end of this first issue—a monument, a book, ⁸⁵ The Portfolio, February, 1812, pp. 186–187.

⁸⁶ New and Original Essays by Joseph Dennie (Philadelphia, 1818). Only one has been found in this series.

and an ink-bottle jumbled together above the phrase, "The Relicks of Dennie."

There are two collective editions of his Lay Sermons, which were clearly modeled after those of "Dr. Yorick." They do not include the larger portion of Dennie's essays of this type, but they contain representative examples. The first volume, published at Walpole in 1796, was the expression of the earlier, more spontaneous essays. The second collection, edited by his friend in Philadelphia, John E. Hall, five years after Dennie's death, revealed more care in selection and form. This same friend included others of Dennie's writings, with a sketch of his life, in The Philadelphia Souvenir for 1826.³⁷

In reading Dennie's Sermons the question sometimes arises: Was the author serious or cynical?—for wit and earnestness are mingled throughout. He was sincere in purpose; never cynical with intent to injure. Sometimes he chose an unusual theme, like that used in the first essay of the early collection. Taking for his subject, "Two is Better than One," he makes a plea for second marriages, under fitting conditions, and illustrates his text by examples from history and literature. Another good "Sermon," among the earlier ones, was inspired by political dangers and gave warning, from the text: "In those days ³⁷ The Philadelphia Souvenir, 1826, pp. 70-93, 96-136.

THE LAY PREACHER; OR SHORT SERMONS, FOR IDLE READERS.

“ THEREFORE, SEEING WE HAVE THIS MINISTRY—
WE PAINT NOT.” ST. PAUL.

Published according to ACT of CONGRESS.

By Joseph Dennie, Esq.

PRINTED AT WALPOLE, NEWHAMPSHIRE,
BY DAVID CARLISLE, JUN.
And Sold at his BOOKSTORE.

1796.

Title-page of first edition of The Lay Preacher, 1796; from copy in American Antiquarian Society Library.

there was no king in Israel; every man did what was right in his own eyes." The last essay in this first collection is worthy of special mention. Here he chose for a theme the prison experiences of Joseph. After some passages of exposition, he applied his text to modern life:

Yet did not the Chief Butler remember Joseph but Forgat him. . . . Many are the promises of the chief butlers, the CHESTERFIELDS, the smooth-tongued men of the world. They keep them too, But so close, that when the day of performance arrives, not even their owner can find them,—mis-laid in some obscure corner of memory's chest!

There is surely not more ground for the charge of irreverence against Dennie than there is for the same accusation regarding the essays by Swift and Sterne. To some minds there is an objection to paraphrasing the Bible words in text and illustration. Beyond this general criticism, there is no offense against religious sentiment, nor are the texts treated with levity. Dennie had a true, lifelong reverence for the Bible; it gave him much comfort in his last hours, as it had in the earlier years when, he declared, it brought him "medicine for the mind." In the later collection of his Sermons, the second one, "On the Pleasures of Study," with text from Rev. 1:1, is a direct plea for Bible-reading. His exposition of the biblical stories was reverent and often illumining, as Paul's voyage to Rome, Samuel and Samson, Ruth and Naomi. Sometimes he used episodes like the sufferings of Job, Jonah's lament for his gourd, or Paul's reproof to Athens, as texts for moralizing upon adversity, fretfulness, and scandal. In reciting the story of Samuel's mother, fashioning yearly the little coat which she carried to the boy, he achieved pictorial effects. Sane precepts on the best ways to keep the sabbath are found in the twentieth "sermon" in the later collection, with text from Amos 8:5. Remonstrating against the formal "yawning" endurance of the sabbath, he urged joyful reverence, whether in service indoors or long walks in the country as a means of healthy worship.

In quantity, the literature of permanent value produced by Dennie is small. As an influence his work was of more importance. His essays were novel and stimulating; uneven in interest, yet seldom wearisome. They lack the epigrammatic value of Franklin's essays and those of the best English writers whom Dennie most admired. They are burdened with verbosity, and sometimes seem affected rather than sincere. On the whole, however, they were written with an earnest desire to elevate the literary tastes of his countrymen, and to stimulate them to read more of the higher literature from which he took his allusions and quotations. His essays give us glimpses of the intellectual and social tastes of his age. As journalist and essayist he was animated with a hope that he might inspire young men to read more intelligently and write more "elegantly." As one approaches his monument in St. Peter's churchyard in Philadelphia, he sees from a distance the wreath which encircles the name, and testifies to the warm friendship with which Dennie was regarded. The epitaph, a long one, was written by John Quincy Adams.⁸⁸ Many of the sculptured words seem too effusive for our judgment to accept, but no one can question the truth of one of the last lines:

He devoted his Life to the Literature of his Country.

⁸⁸ Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, edited by Charles Francis Adams (Philadelphia, 1877), Vol. IX, p. 239.

WILLIAM DUNLAP: THE BEGINNINGS OF DRAMA

VII

WILLIAM DUNLAP: THE BEGINNINGS OF DRAMA

Among the research societies, which seek to find and preserve facts and reminiscences in American history and literature, the Dunlap Society has a specific purpose, as outlined in its first printed report:

The Dunlap Society has been named in honor of William Dunlap, one of the first of American dramatists, one of the earliest of American managers, and the foremost historian of the American Theatre. It has been founded by a Committee of Students of the American Stage, who are also collectors of American dramatic books and prints.¹

The engraving from Dunlap's portrait of himself, owned by the National Academy of Design, is a fitting frontispiece to this report. Two of Dunlap's plays, The Father and André, have been edited and republished by this memorial society.

In order that Dunlap may have his true place among the pioneer dramatists of America, we must review briefly the labored, and almost forgotten, ventures in early drama.² Probably the first attempt at drama written on American soil was Cornelia, by Governor William Berkeley, of Virginia, which was acted in London in 1662, but probably was not printed. Another Colonial governor, Robert Hunter, of New York, wrote a political satire in three acts, in 1714, entitled Androborus; or, The Man-Hater. He was assisted by Lewis Morris. This early play was owned for many years by David Garrick, and later was in the library of the Duke of Devonshire. A play, The Suspected Daughter, by "T. T.," was printed in Boston in 1751, but it has not been traced. The friend of Franklin, Thomas Godfrey, used the popular myth of buried piratical treasure as theme for a broad farce, The Prince of Parthia, in 1759. In London, a few years later, a popular play was Ponteach, which related the unique adventures of its author, Major Robert Rogers, an Indian ranger.

¹ Biennial Reports of the Dunlap Society, 1888, p. 11.

² Exhaustive outlines of early American drama have been made by Oscar Wegelin in Early American Plays (New York,

The early incidents of the Revolution were recited in bombastic attempts at drama. General John Burgoyne had a little literary talent and more vanity. To please the ladies and British officers, during the military investment of Boston, he wrote a farce, The Blockheads, for which Major André composed a comic prologue. When the fortunes of war were reversed, and the British were in derision as foolish adventurers, an answering satire in dialogue form, The Blockheads, appeared. Paul Leicester Ford has assigned this to Mercy Warren. The prologue suggests her style of invective:

1905; second edition, with bibliography of Dunlap), and Paul Leicester Ford in New England Magazine, February, 1894. ("Beginnings of American Dramatic Literature.")

By Yankees frighted too! Oh, dire to say!
 Why Yankees sure at red coats faint away!
 Oh, yes—they thought so too—for lackaday,
 Their general turn'd the blockade to a play;
 Poor vain poltroons—with justice we'll retort,
 And call them blockheads for their idle sport.

Among other plays which recall the earlier years of the war were The Battle of Brooklyn, an unassigned farce; The Fall of British Tyranny, by John Leacock; The Battle of Bunker's Hill,³ by Hugh Henry Brackenridge, and The Motley Assembly, a satire on prominent Loyalist families. Possibly this last was by Mrs. Mercy Warren, who wrote two of the popular dramas of the same period, The Adulateur and The Group.⁴ When the stress of feeling had somewhat lessened, there were lighter farces, operas, and drawing-room dialogues, which portrayed or satirized national traits. Among such was the anonymous opera, The Blockheads; or, the Fortunate Contractor, acted in 1782–83 in London and New York.⁵ Some crude plays were written by the Yale tutor Barnabas Bidwell, which were acted in the colleges. One of these, The Mercenary Match, in 1785, was very popular because it had a strong American note, in remonstrance against the marriage of an American girl to a wealthy foreigner.

³ The Battle of Bunker's Hill: A Dramatic Piece of Five Acts in Heroic Measure. By a Gentleman of Maryland (Philadelphia: Bell, 1776).

⁴ The Adulateur (Boston, 1773); The Group (Boston, 1775; 8vo).

With the exception of the patriotic satires, all plays that were written and acted during the war were disapproved by the anxious, impoverished patriots as a waste of money and time. The American Company of actors, who had enjoyed a season of favor in New York and elsewhere before the war, was forced to the South and to Jamaica, until 1785, when they reappeared in New York. At first, on their return, they gave "Courses of Lectures," and gradually came into the field of drama again. The favorite member of this company, Hallam, had been joined by his cousin, Wignell. The latter made a great success of the character of Jonathan, a typical Yankee, in Royall Tyler's The Contrast, the first distinctively American drama in background, motive, and authorship; this was probably given for the first time in New York, April 16, 1787.⁶

⁵*The Blockheads; or, Fortunate Contractor: An Opera in Two Acts, as it Was Performed at New York. Printed at New York, London. (1782).*

Royall Tyler had written an earlier dramatic sketch, May Day; or, New York in an Uproar, which had been acted by Wignell. After the success of The Contrast, he tried again to gain applause by a comedy, The Georgia Spec; or, Land in the Moon; but this, like his lyric efforts and his Comic Grammar, has been forgotten. The student of American literature still finds mild interest in Tyler's fiction, The Algerine Captive and The Yankey in London. He is, however, generally known as the writer of the first American play that won success and maintained the interest of a later generation.⁷ In the reprint by the Dunlap Society, the editor, Thomas J. McKee, said of its general influence:

The success of "The Contrast" was one of the powerful influences which aided in bringing about in this country a complete revolution of sentiment with respect to the drama and theatrical amusements.⁸

The statement of Tyler in the advertisement of ⁶ This date, generally adopted, has been disputed by Rev. Thomas P. Tyler, who says the initial performance was at Park Theater, April 16, 1789. See Gilman, Bibliography of Vermont (Montpelier, 1897), pp. 282.

⁷ A few of his Songs in manuscript are in the Boston Public Library.

⁸ The Contrast, reprint by the Dunlap Society (New York, 1887), Introduction, p. viii.

his play may be readily believed. He assured the public that he "never critically studied the rules of the drama, and indeed had seen but few exhibitions of the stage." In conclusion, he confessed that the play "was undertaken and finished in the course of three weeks." In spite of the obvious results of such haste and lack of training, there is a tone of vibrant Americanism which won passing favor for the drama, not alone with the public, but also with Washington, whose name appears first upon the list of subscribers to the printed version.⁹ The keynote of patriotism is sounded in the first lines of the prologue:

EXULT, each patriot heart! this night is shewn
 A piece, which we may fairly call our own;
 Where the proud titles of "My Lord!" "Your Grace!"
 To humble Mr. and plain Sir give place.
 Our Author pictures not from foreign climes,
 The fashions or the follies of the times;
 But has confin'd the subject of his work
 To the gay scenes—the circles of New York.

The droll frontispiece was drawn by Dunlap, who recorded his interest in this play and its influence upon him, but who also censured it freely:

It is extremely deficient in plot, dialogue, or incident, but has some marking in the characters, and in that of Jonathan, played by Wignell, a degree of humour and a knowledge of what is termed Yankee dialect which, in the hands of a favourite performer, was relished by an audience gratified by the appearance of home manufacture—a feeling which was soon exchanged for a most discouraging predilection for foreign articles, and contempt for every home-made literary effort.¹⁹

⁹ The title-page of the first edition reads: The Contrast, A Comedy; in five acts. Written by a citizen of the United States; Performed with applause at the Theatres in New-York, Philadelphia and Maryland (1790).

The climax of broad humor is in the first scene of the third act of The Contrast. Here are allusions to the prejudices, then current, against theaters and actors. Jonathan is describing his experiences in the city. Someone hints that he must have seen “the players,” and he exclaims:

Mercy on my soul! Did I see the wicked players? Mayhap that 'ere Darby, that I liked so, was the old serpent himself and had his cloven feet in his pocket. Why, I vow, now I come to think on't, the candles seemed to burn blue, and I'm sure where I sat it smelt tarnally of brimstone.

The three women—Charlotte, Letitia, and Maria—were good types of their own times in manners, but they belong to the universally feminine in sentiments and thoughts. The true motif of the play was summarized in the final speech of Colonel Manly, the priggish hero:

And I have learned that probity, virtue, honour, though they should not have received the polish of Europe, will secure to an honest American the good graces of his countrywomen, and, I hope, the applause of THE PUBLIC.

¹⁹ History of the American Theatre (New York, 1832), pp. 71, 72.

This comedy by Tyler has received detailed attention here, both because of its important place in the development of native drama, and also on account of its influence upon William Dunlap. His own assertion was:

I heard of the success of "The Contrast" and although it was already put on the shelf of the prompter, or buried in his travelling chest, the praises bestowed upon it lit up the inflammable material brought from abroad, and a comedy in five acts was written in a few weeks.¹¹

The incidents of Dunlap's youth, as well as his tastes, inclined him toward the two professions with which he was allied—art and the drama. Born at Perth Amboy, February 19, 1776, his earliest memories clustered about scenes of the Revolution. His father, Samuel Dunlap, a native of Ireland, was in Wolfe's army and was seriously wounded on the Plains of Abraham. When he recovered, he left the army, married Margaret Sargent, and became a storekeeper at Perth Amboy, where his only son was born. According to family stories, William Dunlap was an example of an only child of the "spoiled" kind, tyrannizing over family and slaves alike. Beyond the instruction of his "good mother," as he always called her, he had another teacher in his birth-town, to whom he owed early fondness for books and pictures. This aged friend and his home were described minutely by Dunlap:

¹¹ History of the American Theatre (New York, 1832), p. 77. Dunlap had just returned from four years in England at the time this play was presented.

On the corner of Market and High streets stood the house of Thomas Bartow. He was a small, thin, old man, with straight gray hair hanging in comely guise on each side of his pale face.¹⁸

In this friend's garden, beside the hickory fire in the library, or speeding over the frozen ground behind the old sorrel horse, Dunlap received many happy and lasting lessons on life and books. In memory he recalled this inspiring guide:

Patiently he turned over the pages of Homer and Virgil in the translations of Pope and Dryden, and of Milton's poems, and explained the pictures, until I was familiar with the stories of Troy and Latium,—of heaven and hell, as poets tell them. Nor was history strange to me, especially that of Rome. Thus was commenced a love of reading which has been my blessing.¹⁹

As a boy, Dunlap belonged to a company of "Governor's guards," during the later years of the Revolution. He remembered vividly the arrival of British troops at Perth Amboy, and his desire to follow them far out of town. This incident had more than a passing result for Dunlap, for his family moved to Piscatawa, that they might be sure of safety in an attack. Here, on the banks of the Raritan, the boy found a new teacher in Nature. He made fitful attempts to study at home, and he browsed much in his father's library. The lifelong regret of his life was the lack of any systematic education. But there were compensations at this time. As he recalled:

¹⁸ William Dunlap, History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States (New York, 1834), Vol. I, p. 245, 246.

¹⁹ William A. Whitehead, Contributions to the Early History of Perth Amboy (New York, 1856), pp. 139-41, gives further facts about this man, and also "the Dame School" which Dunlap attended, kept by Mrs. Randal.

My time was principally occupied in swimming and fishing in the creeks of the Raritan, rambling the fields and woods—sailing boats on a mill-pond—visiting the miller—and, in short, in the delights of liberty and idleness,—no, not idleness, for this was as busy a summer as I remember.¹⁴

When his family moved to New York, in 1777, Dunlap's studies were renewed, but only for a brief time. While playing with some friends near the home of Andrew Elliot, in 1778, his right eye was cut by a wood-chip carelessly tossed by a playmate. At first he was threatened with total blindness, but gradually he recovered the use of his left eye. His definite schooling was ended, and pictures became his only resource during weeks of recovery. He began to use India ink in copying prints. His success led to attempts at engravings, and he drew sketches of his relatives "at three guineas a head." In later life he traced his failures in working with color to this early enthusiasm, saying: "My eye became satisfied with light and shadow, and the excitement of color was not necessary to my pleasure."¹⁵

¹⁴ History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States, Vol. I, p. 247.

Dunlap's father thought he could make an artist of his son, if he gave him enough instruction. He sent him as a pupil to William Williams, in New York, who taught him the rudiments of portrait-painting; and the youth experimented upon his family and friends. He was especially anxious to paint the portrait of Washington, and was given the privilege at two different times. The second effort was a crude, full-length portrait, modeled after West's painting of the same subject. The background was the battlefield at Princeton. Beside Washington was the recumbent figure of General Mercer.

To fulfil his ambition for his son, his father sent him to London, in 1784, that he might have the benefit of instruction by Benjamin West. The four years abroad did not much advance Dunlap's progress in his art, for he was idle and conceited, the victim of ill-health and too much freedom and dissipation in a large city. Evidently West did not consider him promising as an art-student, although "Rafe" West, the painter's son, was one of Dunlap's intimates during this period. When Dunlap showed one of his portraits to West, the latter's droll comment was: "You have made the two sides of the figure alike—each has the same sweeping swell—he looks like a rolling pin."¹⁶

¹⁵ Ibid., p. 250. One of the droll efforts in color by Dunlap is at the New York Historical Society: "The Artist Showing a Picture from Hamlet to His Parents."

On his return to America, Dunlap drifted aimlessly for a time; but, after his marriage to Elizabeth Woolsey he renounced his convivial habits and tried to make his life more noble. In the marriage notice, in New York Daily Gazette, February 16, 1789, she is called the amiable and accomplished Miss Nabby Woolsey, of Fairfield, Conn. Dunlap was interested, for a time, in the New York Abolition Society, and freed his father's slaves. Afterward he tried business and visited various cities as a trader in general merchandise. Finally he heard of the success of Tyler's The Contrast, and became filled with the idea that he would be a playwright. His boyhood pleasure in witnessing the plays given by the British soldiers, the more recent enjoyment of plays in London, and the promise of American response seemed to assure him that this was his opportunity.

Op. cit., p. 262.

His first attempt, Modest Soldier; or, Love in New York, was, he said, "read to critics as young and ignorant as the author, and praised to his heart's content. It has long slept in the tomb of the Capulets, and fortunately no traces remain of its merits or demerits."¹⁷ It is to be regretted that the same fate did not attend many others of his more than sixty plays.

The second effort was more successful in immediate and lasting results. The first performance was at the John Street Theater, September 7, 1789. It was entitled The Father; or, American Shandyism; in a later issue the title was The Father of an Only Child.¹⁸ The comedy abounds in melodrama, crude and complicated situations, until the reader is prepared to echo the sentiment of the epilogue, which was spoken by Mrs. Henry, of the American Company:

Well, We've got thro' and in good truth I'm glad on't,
A sorry, whining, canting time I've had on't,—
My true love lost and found, and found and lost;
Like shuttlecock my passions pitch'd and toss'd.

There were references to the political situation,

¹⁷ History of the American Theatre (New York, 1832), p. 77.

¹⁸ This was reprinted from the original in 1887, by the Dunlap Society, with an introduction by Thomas J. McKee. The original play was first printed in the Massachusetts Magazine, October and November, 1789.

especially to the proposed and rejected amendments to the Articles of Confederation, in the speeches by the leading characters, Mr. Racket and his petulant wife.

The response to this first play fired Dunlap with determination to write more. In reminiscence he confessed :

Filled with youthful ardour and pleased with the applause of the public and the encouragement of his associates, he tho't only of future triumphs, and tragedies and comedies, operas and farces, occupied his mind, his time and his pen.¹⁹

The second play which was acted was a trifle, Darby's Return, written as a benefit for the actor Wignell. The character of the poor, genial soldier was long recalled. With a party of guests, Washington attended this play at its first staging in New York, and was embarrassed at first, and then amused, by the references to himself.²⁰ In homely phrase, Darby told of Washington's service :

A man who fought to free the land from wo,
Like me, had left his farm a-soldiering to go,
But having gained his point, he had, like me,

¹⁹ History of the American Theatre (New York, 1832), p. 114. The long list of his plays as given by Wegelin in Early American Plays, including a number of manuscripts, testifies to the truth of this word.

²⁰ Ibid., p. 85. The same story is in Martha J. Lamb, History of the City of New York, Vol. II, p. 352; also in Paul L. Ford, Washington and the Theatre (New York, 1899).

Return'd his own potato ground to see.
But there he could not rest. With one accord
He's called to be a kind of,—not a lord,—
I don't know what, he's not a great man sure,
For poor men love him just as he were poor.

When Kathleen asked, "How look'd he, Darby? Was he short or tall?" Dunlap said Washington showed embarrassment from the expectation of one of those eulogies which he had been obliged to hear on many public occasions and which must doubtless have been a severe trial to his feelings; but Darby's answer that he had not seen him, because he had mistaken "a man all lace and glitter, botherum and shine" for him, until the show had passed, relieved the hero from apprehension of further personality, and he indulged in that which was with him extremely rare, a hearty laugh.

Such an anticlimax was often found in Dunlap's plays. He chose this device to bring in humor and, in many cases, to speak a message of democracy.

For the rival of Wignell, the actor Hodgkinson, Dunlap wrote the play that was printed later as Lord Leicester, but the title of which, as acted April 24, 1794, was The Fatal Deception; or, The Progress of Guilt. This play did not win much applause; so the dramatist created a character akin to that of Darby, in the farce Shelty's Travels. This was left among his manuscript plays; but it had temporary fame, and cleared five hundred dollars for the actor's benefit. In the copy of Lord Leicester printed in New York, probably in 1807, the author wrote: "To the Reader":

The following poem, my first effort in tragic composition, and the first American tragedy produced upon the stage, was written in the year 1790, and first played at New York, in 1794. Its success confirmed my attachment to the drama.

To most readers, Matilda urging Henry to the murder of Leicester will appear as a copy of lady Macbeth; but she is, in reality, more in situation like the Clytemnestra of the Greek poets; yet essentially different (independent of difference in merit) from both.

May, 1806.

W. Dunlap.

In this play the part of Leicester was taken by Hallam, and that of Cecil by Hodgkinson.

Soon after Dunlap's plays had begun to attract favorable attention, he was persuaded by Hodgkinson to enter a partnership with him as theatrical manager. This was a fatal error, as regarded the financial future of Dunlap. He hoped, however, to improve the American stage and to educate the public to appreciate native dramas of purity. At sixty-five, with shattered health and fortunes, he still affirmed that he had the thoughts and wishes of one who, on trial, found circumstances too strong for his desires of reform, and, who, after a struggle (with ruined health and fortunes,) gave up the contest without giving up the wish or hope.²²

²² History of the American Theatre, p. 143.

Hodgkinson persuaded Dunlap to purchase a share in the John Street Theater, and later to join him in a lease of the Park Theater, with a cost for fittings of one hundred and thirty thousand dollars. He also emphasized to Dunlap the opportunity thus afforded for presenting the latter's plays. The month after Dunlap had assumed management, he brought out his opera The Archers, the tale of William Tell. This was an adaptation; Hodgkinson as William Tell and his wife as Cecily won many plaudits.²² The "Basket Song" was retained in books of parlor music for many years after the play had been forgotten:

Come, who'll buy my baskets?
 I've small and I've great,
 They are fit for all uses,
 And suiting each state.

Chorus: Come, who'll buy my baskets?

Buck-baskets, bread-baskets,
 Of broom and of chip;
 Work baskets for ladies
 Who ne'er have the hip.

Chorus: Come, who'll buy my baskets?

Here's love-letter baskets
 Of willow so trim

²² This was adapted from "a piece, Helvetic Liberty, left with him." His title reads: The Archers or Mountaineers of Switzerland. An Opera in 3 acts, as performed by the Old American Company (New York, 1796).

For the swain who sore sighs
 At his mistress's whim.

Chorus: Come, who'll buy my baskets?

Discords soon followed triumphs at the theater. Quarrels arose between Hodgkinson and Hallam, and Dunlap was compelled to borrow and advance money to meet the expenses of his partner while on trips in Boston and Hartford. With quiet sarcasm he wrote of his share in these extravagances of Hodgkinson: "His partner sent on money and advice. The one was taken, the other rejected."²⁸

Valuable aid in studying the life of Dunlap during this part of his career, both as manager and as playwright, is found in some volumes of manuscript journals recently acquired by the New York Historical Society. Portions are here printed by permission. The four volumes at this library are numbered 14, 15, 24, and 30, in an evidently broken series. They thus cover not alone the two years of his activity as playwright, 1797-98, but the later volumes reveal his last years of struggle as painter and author. The books are bound in leather, and the handwriting is generally clear and strong.

The first entry, July 27, 1797, is a typical record of a day in Dunlap's life, bringing its own testimony to his energy and varied interests:

²⁸ History of the American Theatre, p. 201.

I arose at half-past 4 O'clock and worked in the garden untill breakfast. Went with the Children to Mr. Parker's where I left Margaret. Read Hume with John Read^m in the 15th vol. of Enc; which I borrowed on the 25th from Mr. Parker's family; on which evening I read several arts. in it to my Wife; particularly potatoes. Read this morning to my Wife Art. Platonism; finding the opinion of Plato in respect to a first cause of the Universe and co-existing Matter very similar to ideas of my own expressed in Ufrasia, I took up ye vol. of my Memoirs & read to my Wife one of the dialogues between Joseph and Abbas. Read Hume with ye boy. Read in Enc. arts. Platonism, Plotinus, Plover, etc. Walk out to my Farm,—the buckwheat is well up.

Following such entries of domestic and personal interest are passages relating to his dramas. He records the opinion of Thomas Holcroft, to whom he had sent some of his plays with a view to publication. The decision was unfavorable; the publisher had read "William Tell first and did not care to read the others." Dunlap accepted the verdict with good grace, saying: "His opinion in respect to the publication is just and the knowledge of that opinion is salutary to me."

Letters from Hodgkinson, dated from Hartford and Boston, brought Dunlap tidings of "expenditures far in excess of receipts." The scattered sentences which follow indicate the stress and anxiety which such mismanagement caused Dunlap: "August 15, Rec'd letters from ^m This reference is to his son, who died in early manhood.

Hodgkinson filled with ill-fortune—wrote to him —‘I can send no more; we may as well stop at once. How I shall pay what I owe here I know not.’” A few days later, after a night of anxiety, he wrote in the journal: “The greater part of this day has been passed in fruitless attempts to borrow money.”

Near the close of the first manuscript volume, November 25, 1797, there is a significant entry: “Write on André.” The early pages of the second volume of the journal (Volume 15) mention this play in progress of writing; then, later, in presentation. As this was the drama which has given Dunlap his true recognition in later years, it is fitting to speak of it in detail. Reading the story from entries in the journal, we find that in December, 1797, Dunlap returned from Boston, where he had been compelled to give security for Hodgkinson’s debts. On his way back to New York he had stopped at New Haven, at his “excellent brother Dwight’s,” to whom he had read parts of his new play.²⁵ According to the journal, André was finished January 21, 1798, but it was March 27 before final rehearsals began. Cooper, Hallam, and Hodgkinson became involved in a three-cornered quarrel over the parts, and the presentation was much delayed. But on March 30 there was this significant diary note:

²⁵ Mrs. Dunlap was the sister of the wife of President Timothy Dwight.

Title-page of William Dunlap's play, Andre, 1798.

Evening, André & poor Soldier in ye house—$817. The play was much applauded, notwithstanding the extreme imperfectness of Cooper & of some others but on Blands throwing down his Cockade there was (sic) a few hisses.

This incident of the cockade nearly made the play a fiasco. It was dangerous to choose the character of André and his fate as a subject for drama within eighteen years of the dates of the events, and while partisan spirit was still smoldering. Cooper, in the character of Bland, a young American officer who had been kindly treated by André and became his friend while imprisoned within the British lines, finding that his pleas would not save the life of André, tore the American cockade from his casque and threw it down. This episode in the play was easily misinterpreted at the time it was first given. Afterward Dunlap said:

This was not, perhaps could not be, understood by a mixed assembly; they thought the country and its defenders insulted, and a hiss ensued—it was soon quieted and the play ended with applause.²²

The contemporary version of the affair, in his journal, indicates that the feeling was not confined to the first night, but lived for a day or two. April 2, 1798, before the second or third presentation, he wrote: "I am told that the people are so offended at the Cocade business as to threaten to hiss off the play tonight." A severe storm prevented the play from being given that night, and before its next performance Dunlap says that he "made an alteration in the 5th act, by making Bland, on his repentance, receive the cockade again." The play was repeated April 6, "for the Author's benefit and cleared $329."

²² History of the American Theatre, p. 222.

In spite of many technical defects and "wooden speeches," Dunlap achieved considerable success with the character of André. In the reprint of this play, J. Brander Matthews has said, criticizing its merits: "Of all the plays on the subject of Arnold's treason and André's sad fate, the André of Mr. Dunlap is easily the best, both as literature and as a successful acting drama."²⁷ The best portion of the play is in Act II, the interview between André and Bland:

ANDRÉ. Oft in the generous heat of glowing youth,
 Oft have I said how fully I despised
 All bribery base, all treacherous tricks in war:
 Rather my blood should bathe these hostile shores,
 And have it said, "He died a gallant soldier,"

²⁷ The Original edition was entitled: André: A Tragedy in 5 acts. By William Dunlap (New York, 1798; London, 1799); reprint by the Dunlap Society (New York, 1887). Introduction by J. Brander Matthews, p. xxiv.

Than with my country's gold encourage treason,

And thereby purchase gratitude and fame.

BLAND. Still may'st thou say it, for thy heart's the same. . . .

ANDRÉ. Still is my heart the same. But there has past
A day, an hour, which ne'er can be recall'd,
Unhappy man! Tho' all thy life pass pure,
Mark'd by benevolence thy every deed;
The out-spread map, which shows the way
thou'st trod,

Without one devious track or doubtful line,
It all avails thee naught, if in one hour,
One hapless hour, thy feet are led astray;—
Thy happy deeds all blotted from remembrance;

Cancell'd the record of thy former good,
Is it not hard, my friend? Is't not unjust?

BLAND. Not every record cancel'd. O, there are hearts
Where Virtue's image, when 'tis once engrav'd,
Can never know erasure.

The later lines of this act, in which André recites the incidents of his treason and capture, have a sustained interest, although many lines lack spontaneity and force:

BLAND. It was thy duty so to serve thy country.

ANDRÉ. Nay, nay; be cautious ever to admit
That duty can beget dissimulation.
On ground, unoccupied by either part,
Neutral esteem'd, I landed, and was met.
But ere my conference was with Arnold clos'd,
The day began to dawn; I then was told
That till the night I must my safety seek

In close concealment. Within your posts convey'd

I found myself involved in unthought dangers,
Night came. I sought the vessel which had borne

Me to the fatal spot; but she was gone.

Retreat that way cut off, again I sought

Concealment with the traitors of your army.

Arnold now granted passes, and I doff'd

My martial garb, and put on curs'd disguise.

Thus in a peasant's form I pass'd your posts;

And when, as I conceiv'd my danger o'er,

Was stopt and seiz'd by some returning scouts.

So did ambition lead me, step by step,

To treat with traitors, and encourage treason;

And then, bewilder'd in the guilty scene,

To quit my martial designating badges,

Deny my name and sink into the spy.

The interest awakened by this tragedy induced Dunlap to introduce some of the same characters—Washington, Arnold, Paulding, and André—in a melodrama, The Glory of Columbia, which was first given at the Park Theater, July 4, 1803.²⁸ Some of the songs, which formed a prominent feature of this play, were crude, but spirited, such as the chorus, "Glory of Columbia," sung to the tune of "Washington's March":

²⁸ The Glory of Columbia; her Yeomanry: A Play in 5 acts. The Songs, Duets and Choruses, intended for the celebration of the Fourth of July at the New-York Theatre (New York, 1803).

See, the standards float,
 So proudly gay!
 Hark! the trumpet's note,
 With clanging bray.

While every breast with conscious might,
 Swells ardent for the coming fight!

.

The fight is done,
 The battle won!

Our praise is due to him alone,
 Who from his bright eternal throne,
 The fate of battles and of man decides!
 To him all praise be given!
 And under heaven,
 To great Columbia's son,
 Blest WASHINGTON!

Who o'er the fight like fate presides.

As one looks over the list of Dunlap's plays, with dates of writing, performance, and publication,²⁹ he will note his years of plenty and of famine as a playwright. The climax of his popularity was at the close of the eighteenth century. The year 1800 has a record of eight plays that were either performed or printed, in addition to some that failed to win sufficient favor to be produced. Following this period of fecundity there was an interval of discouragement. A brief revival of success came in 1803, when he produced The Voice of Nature, which was an adaptation from a French play, Le Jugement de Salomon; Ribbemont; or, The Feudal Baron; The Blind Boy, later given in London,⁸⁰ and The Glory of Columbia. Another period of desuetude, as regarded publication, followed for four or five years. Then came an awakening of interest in his plays, as is indicated by the performance and printing, within a few years, of the historical dramas Rinaldo Rinaldini, The Battle of New Orleans, and The Soldier of Seventy-Six, such translations as Blue Beard, Lover's Vows, and The Africans, and the opera Yankee Chronology, with its "Huzza Song" which long survived its time of composition, in the War of 1812. It had a rollicking refrain:

²⁹ Such lists are to be found in the reprint of The Father by the Dunlap Society, and also in Oscar Wegelin, Early American Plays (2d ed., 1905).

Then huzza! for the Sons of Columbia so free!
They are lords of the soil—they'll be lords of the sea!

At intervals in his later life Dunlap wrote plays for special occasions, or at the requests of theater managers. One of the last of this type was A Trip to Niagara—a farce which was, according to his own explanation in the preface, "intended as a kind of running accompaniment to the more important product of the Scene painter." It illustrated a diorama of New York harbor, the Catskills, and Niagara.⁸¹ It is noteworthy that ⁸⁰ For full title and date of these plays, see the Bibliography.

⁸¹ A Trip to Niagara. Written for the Bowery Theatre, N. Y., by William Dunlap, Historical and Portrait Painter, in this mongrel play one of the characters was Leatherstocking. There existed a strong friendship between Cooper and Dunlap, in the latter's last years. To the novelist, Dunlap dedicated his American edition of the History of the American Theatre.

After such a general survey of Dunlap's work as playwright, the queries arise: What were his merits as a dramatist, and why does he deserve recognition, in the face of such defects and with such meager literary skill? His defects were obvious; to him they seemed insurmountable. In an address which prefaced *Rinaldo Rinaldini*⁸² he thanked the public for past favors, and declared:

I am sensible of disadvantages which I consequently labour under, from a confined education, nor do I expect my style will be thought equal in elegance or energy to the productions of those who, fortunately, from their situation in life, have been instructed in the classics and have reaped both pleasure and improvement, by studying the ancients in their original purity.—I wish to be understood that my pretensions to originality are small.

Dunlap well summarized here his chief faults—lack of a strong style and of much originality. Largely because of his rapid writing, but also from deficient training, his style was often loose and weak. There are a few passages of dramatic energy, and occasional characters with marked portraiture, as we have cited; but the mass of his plays lapse into mediocrity. His claim to remembrance cannot rest upon any individual play, with the possible exception of André; but he deserves some praise for skill in meeting the demands of his age, and for persistent efforts to cultivate a taste for pure, American drama.

Author of Memoirs of G. F. Cooke, C. B. Brown, Father of an Only Child, etc. (New York, 1830).

⁸² Rinaldo Rinaldini or the Great Banditti. By an American and a Citizen of New York (New York, 1810), p. iii.

A critic has used the phrase "well made" to describe Dunlap's plays.³³ In general construction and adaptation to the fashions of his day, his plays were cleverly devised. They were always wholesome morally, whether of his own conception or translated from Kotzebue, Iffland, and other playwrights. He was sometimes extravagant in sensibility to suit the tastes of the time, but his tone was not prurient. He exerted a dual influence as dramatist and theater-manager. He lost money in the latter experience, and was reduced to penury; but he never lost his patience nor his confidence in the public. For fifteen years he struggled, endured bickerings among actors, debts, sickness; but he still maintained a firm faith in God and man, and a belief that there was a future of appreciation for both playwrights and actors of high ideals.

³³ John Malone in Introduction (p. vi) to Oscar Wegelin, Early American Plays (published by the Dunlap Society, New York, 1900 and 1905).

It may seem almost incredible that sufficient material existed for a bulky History of the American Theatre in 1832, when Dunlap published his volume. The style and plan of the history were alike leisurely, with many side-excursions into letters, politics, and society. After two or more pages of rambling reminiscence, the author would halt and admonish his readers: "But let us return to New York and the Drama." In addition to the autobiographical chapters, much valuable information was preserved by Dunlap regarding plays, their writers and actors, without which later studies of the stage would have been inadequate. Comparing himself to Colley Cibber in this work, he quotes from his English model:

If I have any particular qualification for the task more than another, it is that I am perhaps the only person living (however unworthy) from whom the same materials could be collected.*

After we have read, with kindly interest, the portraits of famous actors and authors of that day, and the mingled success and pathos in Dunlap's own life, it is disturbing to meet such a sentence of wholesale disparagement as this by Seilhamer: "Dunlap's statements of facts are almost always misstatements, either in whole or in part." ⁸⁵ Nor is this later critic quite justified in such a sweeping condemnation. Some of Dunlap's dates, and many of his deductions, have been corrected by later research; but, as a whole, his History of the American Theatre is not alone entertaining, but reliable, as a portrayal of characters and a graphic revelation of the dramatic impulse in America which survived the fierce opposition and many discouragements of the first half-century of national life.

* William Dunlap, History of the American Theatre. Preface, p. viii (New York, 1832; London, 1833).

With greater justice toward Dunlap's underlying motives and appreciation of his charm, Samuel Isham, in his recent History of American Painting has written words which may apply both to the History of the American Theatre and also to the History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design:

He had a feeling for accuracy rare at the time. Like Herodotus he relates many fables but relates them as they were told him and gives his authority. . . . He had a good eye for character and he had fixed moral standards. It is only in his pages that we seem to touch the reality of West and Stuart and Trumbull, and Allston and Sully. Men were as sensitive then as today, and the men of whom he wrote and their friends were displeased at his frankness; but viewed at the present distance of time, he seems rather kindly. He had his dislikes but he was harder on no one than on himself. One of his charms is his old-fashioned style as remote from that of the present day as Bacon's, a little ponderous but clear and animated. Being of his time he had to moralize some, but he does it briefly, and compensates for it by introducing innumerable anecdotes, including some remarkably good ones. All of his successors have poached on his preserves, but none has paraphrased them without loss of point or character."⁸⁸

⁸⁵ George O. Seilhamer, History of the American Theatre during the Revolution and after. (Philadelphia, 1889), Vol. II, p. 274.

In Dunlap's History of the American Theatre are delightful sidelights upon famous men and women of the past, especially among the actors and playwrights. There is a typical example of his anecdotal quality in this paragraph about the actor Henry:

Henry was the only actor in America who kept a carriage. It was in the form of a coach, but very small, just sufficient to carry himself and wife to the theatre, and it was drawn by one horse and driven by a black boy. Aware of the jealousy towards players, and that it would be said he kept a coach, he had caused to be painted on the doors, in the manner of those coats of arms which the aristocracy of Europe display, two crutches in heraldic fashion, with the motto, "This or these."⁸⁹

The work by Dunlap, as chronicler of both theater and art in America, was done in his last years after he had met virtual defeat in both these ⁸⁸ Samuel Isham, History of American Painting (New York, 1905), pp. 72, 73.

⁸⁹ History of the American Theatre, p. 79.

branches of pioneer effort. In his History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States, published two years after his history of the theater, he traced the lives of many early artists, painters, miniaturists, engravers, and teachers of art. He recounted with frankness his own failures. In a tone of sadness he wrote:

In my history of the American Theatre I believe I proved to my reader's satisfaction that I was not qualified to be a director of a play-house and I now intend to show the causes that, at the age of twenty-three, and after a long residence in London, left me ignorant of anatomy, perspective, drawing and coloring, and returned me home a most incapable painter.

He abandoned painting for many years, while he was writing and presenting plays. After his first severe downfall of favor and loss of income as manager, in 1805, he turned to miniature-painting as a resource. Visiting various cities, he secured orders for miniatures from some people of note, like Josiah Quincy, David Humphreys, Mrs. Darley, James Fennell, and others. Through the assistance of Malbone, the artist, he was instructed in the application of colors and the preparation of ivory. To extend his efforts in art, he went to Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk, securing commissions for portraits and miniatures, and painting some landscapes. His family was living at this time in his mother's home in Perth Amboy.

For a few years, from about 1807 to 1812, he assumed charge of a theater in New York for his friend the actor T. Apthorp Cooper. As he was engaged on a salary, this experience proved to be more profitable than the earlier management. He moved his family to New York, where they lived on Beekman Street, and he became closely associated with men of affairs and letters in the two clubs of the day, the Drone and the Friendly. During this time he prepared and wrote portions of his memoirs of the actor George Fred Cooke and the novelist Charles Brockden Brown.⁸⁸ Another position, with a definite salary affixed, was obtained for him through friends, in 1814, when he was appointed assistant paymaster of the militia of New York. He held this place for three years. Apparently he had difficulty in keeping his accounts accurate, for he was charged with defalcation to the extent of a thousand dollars. A careful examination of his books, etc., revealed the gratifying fact that the mistake was accidental and the actual deficit was only one dollar.

⁸⁸ Memoirs of George Fred Cooke, Esq., Late of the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden; by William Dunlap (London, 1813; 2 vols.). The Life of Charles Brockden Brown, together with Selections from the Rarest of his Printed Works, from his Original Letters, and from his Manuscripts Before Unpublished. By William Dunlap (Philadelphia, 1815; 2 vols.).

The last twenty years of his life were largely given to painting and exhibiting pictures. Thus he gained an income to meet his actual needs. But he was not satisfied with his work, and realized that it would have only temporary appreciation. In the autumn of 1819 he went to Norfolk, where he remained six months. Taking up the story of his life, as found in the last two volumes of manuscript journals in the New York Historical Society, we find many revelations of interest and pathos. He secured commissions for paintings in Norfolk, largely portraits, to the amount of three hundred and fifteen dollars. The first part of his sojourn was alone; but later his wife joined him. The promises of the first weeks failed to be redeemed in some cases. To his journal, March 21, 1820, he confided:

It is now long since I have begun a picture & I look anxiously to the close of my stay here. I have many visitors, much praise & flattery, and I have been constantly employ'd, but after all shall arrive in N. Y. perhaps as poor as I left it. I have supported myself & my family, & perhaps open'd a source of support (or more) for the future. I ought to be thankful. I am, altho' my spirits sink sometimes.

While in Norfolk he sketched and later painted a picture, "Christ Rejected," which became very popular as an exhibit. It was sent on exhibition to Boston, Portland, and elsewhere in New England, and as far west as Ohio. In Portland alone the returns financially were three hundred dollars in two weeks; in New York it remained fourteen weeks on exhibition and aggregated six hundred and fifty dollars. Ministers urged their parishioners to see the painting, and, in spite of marked defects in drawing and color, it was widely heralded. While in Norfolk, Dunlap wrote, and had printed, a descriptive pamphlet outlining the characters and motif of the picture.³⁹ He acknowledged his indebtedness to West's painting of the same subject, but said: "It is scarcely within the limits of possibility, certainly not of probability, that Mr. West's Picture should ever be seen in the western world." What seemed to him improbable, however, happened in a short time; West's painting was sent to America on exhibition, in charge of his son, and Dunlap was compelled to make some modifications in his painting, where the figures resembled his model too closely.

The success with this religious subject induced him to paint others—"Christ Bearing the Cross" and "Death on the Pale Horse."⁴⁰ According to a descriptive pamphlet printed in Boston after the death of Dunlap, the painting of "Death on the Pale Horse, or Opening of the First Four Seals," reached a high-water mark of popularity and an offer of ten thousand dollars was refused for the painting.⁴¹ Possibly this refers to West's painting of the same subject. "A Child Returning from School" and "The Historic Muse," were painted about the same time, while Dunlap was executing a commission for portraits in Orwell, Vermont.

³⁹ Descriptive Pamphlet of Dunlap's Painting of Christ Rejected (Norfolk, no date). See full title in the Bibliography, p. 21.

One who seeks information about Dunlap, the painter, is beset with discouragements. In view of the vast amount of work which he accomplished with his brush and pencil, it is surprising how little can now be traced. On the other hand, his paintings were curios rather than works of art in the true meaning; yet they gained a degree of popularity which would naturally insure them remembrance until the present time. Looking over the catalogues of annual exhibitions of the National Academy of Design, from 1826 to 1836, one finds Dunlap's name attached to scores of ⁴⁰ The first was painted in 1824, the latter in 1828. For detailed study, see Isham, History of American Painting (New York, 1905), pp. 186-201.

⁴¹ Descriptive Pamphlet of Painting of Death on the Pale Horse (Boston, 1840).

paintings of varied kinds; very few of these can now be traced.⁴² Among the portraits mentioned on these lists are those of Governor George Clinton, Anthony Bleecker, General P. B. Porter, Bishop Channing Moore, of Virginia, and George P. Morris. Subjects of religious and allegorical paintings by Dunlap, exhibited during these years, include "Cupid Sleeping," "Scene from Cooper's The Spy," "Barabbas and the Thieves," "Our Saviour and Mary Magdalene in the Garden," "Richard and Kenneth from Scott's The Talisman." In March, 1905, there were sold in Philadelphia a collection of miniatures on ivory and some sketches in oil and water-color by Dunlap. The latter were landscapes in New York, New Jersey, and Philadelphia. There were sixteen miniatures, only four of which could be surely recognized—Mrs. Wignell, Mrs. Darley, James Fennell, and the artist's miniature of himself.⁴³

As the years passed, Dunlap was weakened by sickness and more financial reverses. Two benefits were arranged for him—one by his friends among actors and playwrights, the other by his colleagues among artists. The first was in February, 1833, although Dunlap recorded the month as March; and the sum of twenty-five hundred dollars was netted for his benefit. For this occasion a poem was written by George P. Morris.⁴⁴ The second benefit was five years later—a loan exhibition, known as the Dunlap Exhibition, in November, 1838. Paintings were loaned by Trumbull, Cole, Durand, Jarvis, Copley, and the following by Dunlap: "Calvary," "The Historic Muse," "A Child Returning from School," "Scene from The Spy," and various portraits. In announcing this exhibition and soliciting the patronage of the public, G. C. Verplanck emphasized its purpose as a benefit to our estimable fellow-citizen, MR. DUNLAP, who is well known to you, as having rendered great and lasting services to art, history and literature of our state and country. In the decline of an honourable life, devoted mainly to these objects on which he still exerts his remaining strength with unimpaired zeal and patriotism, he finds his old age, which has so many claims to the respect and gratitude of his fellow-citizens, harassed by ill-health and straitened circumstances.⁴⁵

⁴²Dunlap was the organizer as well as the beneficiary of this academy; see Isham, op. cit., chap. 10.

⁴³An attractive catalogue of this sale was compiled by Stan V. Henkels.

The last volume of Dunlap's manuscript journal, in the New York Historical Society—

⁴⁴ This poem is included in Occasional Addresses, edited by Laurence Hutton and William Carey (published by the Dunlap Society, 1890), pp. 51-53.

⁴⁵ A flattering estimate of Dunlap's ability was in a letter from Verplanck in The Talisman, 1829.

evidently the last he ever wrote—is covered with marbled paper and shows, in the feebleness of handwriting, the illness which was upon him. He was ambitious and industrious to the last, however, anxious to finish the histories of New York, and also the history of the progress of art in this country. A few scattered extracts from the journal will be most fitting here :

June 26th, 1833. It will be seen by the last vol. that I was very busy in Phila., that I was not at ease as to health, that I saw many persons to collect materials for my history of the Fine Arts in America, yet I left much undone. This day I sit down again in New York to continue my labours & enjoy the blessings conferred upon me & be thankful.

July 10th, 1833. See Durand & engage him to engrave my portrait for the Hist. of the Arts.

July 20th, 1833. My work appeared to bring on stricture. Is it the effect of natural decay? Must I refrain from this, so delightful to me? Read Gibbon's Rome.

August 26th, 1833. Begun 2 portraits. Met Paulding & Cooper. Bank acc't $123. [Notes on books read for his history and mention of increasing illness.]

Thursday, April 3rd, 1834. [After an operation.] I sincerely believed it to be my duty & the will of God that I should undergo this operation & to his will I hope in all things to resign myself with thanks & gratitude. Read a little & think a little relatively to my Hist. of Art.

In addition to these histories of the theater and of art, Dunlap wrote, during the last years, a school history of New York,⁴⁶ in dialogue, and a History of the New Netherlands, which appeared almost simultaneously with his death.

Few men were more gracious and generous than Dunlap. It often seems, in reading his life, that he was the victim of the schemes and knavery of others, because of his very kindness and credulity. An anecdote told by Dr. John Francis illustrates this trait.⁴⁷ A French refugee, Dr. Pierre Michaux, had published a tract, with a Latin title, on some surgical subject. In spite of its distorted facts, it attracted much attention. Dr. Wright Post, an eminent but irascible physician, begged Dunlap to write a caricature of the French doctor and his tract. Ready to please his friends and happy to be chosen, Dunlap wrote a satire which was used as an after-piece at the John Street Theater. It was called Fractura Minimi Digiti. Michaux, hearing of the caricature, saw it at the theater, and was so exasperated at its mimicry of his features and manners that he attacked Dunlap on the street, beating him so severely that the playwright was ill for several days.

Dunlap's work in both art and drama was ephemeral, judged by modern standards. He wrote plays rapidly to catch the favor of the hour, and they were soon forgotten. He lost health and patrimony in a seemingly futile effort to elevate the theater and cultivate a taste for native talent. He gave fitful attention to art, in his youth, gaining only mediocre skill which yielded him a source of income for his later years. Turning from an estimate of his personal achievement to his influence on American drama and art, we must admit that Dunlap should be honored. His ideals were rudely treated in the struggle of life, but he never lost his faith in them nor in his countrymen. He believed that later workers would create something worthy, in place of his own defective products.

⁴⁶ A History of New York for Schools (New York, 1837, 2 vols., 16mo). History of the New Netherlands, etc. (New York, 1839; 2 vols., 8vo).

⁴⁷ John W. Francis, Old New York, 1866, pp. 66-8.

CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN AND PIONEERS IN FICTION

From a miniature painted by William Dunlap, 1806, engraved by J. B. Forrest; reproduced from National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans, 1835.

VIII

CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN AND PIONEERS IN FICTION

In the history of the world's literature, fiction, in its modern meaning, has been one of the latest forms of development. For various reasons, the novelist came late in America. A realization of the true relation of man to his neighbors and his surroundings must precede the creation of the novel. This grasp of conditions, and the ability to portray them in vivid narrative, did not exist in America until the stability of the nation had been assured. Slowly the colonists had emerged from repression, and indifference to nature, beauty, art, until they seemed to have a new appreciation of such influences. Then this awakening was retarded by the struggle for freedom. War and its issues were the themes which commended themselves to the patriot-writers. When independence had been won, unity was not yet established, and literature took the forms of argumentation and satire to secure national harmony and a stable government. Then followed a period of bombast, an ambition to be original. Prodigal pens did not wait for training, but wrote with a braggadocio which took the place of art.

Under such conditions, the first products of imaginative type were generally in meter—odes and a few bizarre dramas already mentioned. The beginnings of a national fiction were still delayed. In 1789 Isaiah Thomas printed, at his Boston shop, a novel, The Power of Sympathy; or, the Triumph of Nature founded in Truth.” This was without name of author, but in the copy at the American Antiquarian Society there is a pencil note, after the title, “by Mrs. Sarah Wentworth (Apthorp) Morton.” Like other early tales of this period both in England and in America, this was a story of seduction and deceit, with a pronounced moral. The author dedicated the two tiny volumes—

To the Young Ladies, of United Columbia. These Volumes, Intended to represent the specious Causes and to expose the fatal Consequences of Seduction; To inspire the Female Mind with a Principle of Self Complacency, and to Promote the Economy of Human Life, are Inscribed, with Esteem and Sincerity, By their Friend and Humble Servant.

The Author. Boston. January, 1789.

The tale is in the form of letters from the young women and men introduced—Harrington, Worthy, Harriot, and Myra. A sample of the sentimental style of this pioneer effort at fiction follows:

You may now felicitate me—I have had an interview with the charmer I informéd you of. . . . Her mien is elegant—her disposition inclining to the melancholy, and yet her temper is affable, and her manners easy. And as I poured my tender vows into the heart of my beloved, a crimson drop stole across her cheek, and thus I construe it in my own favour, as the sweet messenger of hope.¹

The following year appeared Charlotte Temple, published in England in 1790, and four years later in America. Its author, Mrs. Susanna Rowson, daughter of a British naval officer, had been encouraged to write her impressions of America. Some of these she had interwoven in her earlier novels, Victoria and The Inquisitor; but they had meager interest to Americans when compared with the later tear-inciting tale of brass buttons, American war-scenes, and feminine tragedy and sensibility in Charlotte Temple. This maintained a wonderful hold upon the readers of its own and the next generation.²

Royall Tyler and Hugh Henry Brackenridge wrote some fiction as well as drama. Their narratives, The Algerine Captive and Modern Chivalry, ¹ The Power of Sympathy; or, the TRIUMPH of NATURE founded in TRUTH. 2 vols. Printed at Boston, by Isaiah Thomas and Company. Sold at their Bookstore, No. 45 Newbury Street, and at said Thomas's Bookstore in WORCESTER (1789), pp. 7-9.

² Charlotte Temple (London, 1790; New York, 1794). It has recently been reprinted. Several editions appeared earlier. The grave of the heroine is often searched for by tourists in Trinity Churchyard, New York.

seem slow reading to the student today, but they aroused enthusiasm at the time of their appearance, and are still of interest as revelations of the tastes and customs of the period which they portray. Both were of the adventurous type, mingling romance with heavy humor.⁸

During the last years of the eighteenth century several romances were written in England and on the continent, of the sentimental, fantastic kind, like Lewis' The Monk, Mrs. Radcliffe's The Mysteries of Udolpho, and Godwin's Caleb Williams. These novels were published in 1794, and became models for initial efforts in American fiction of the early nineteenth century. While authors advocated originality, and often attempted to achieve it, the earliest American novels were really adaptations of English models. The reflex influence of Puritanism was shown in a few stories of this time, fittingly called "melodramatic piety," as Caroline Warren's The Gamesters; or, The Ruins of Innocence, and The Power of Sympathy, outlined above.

Charles Brockden Brown began his work, as the first American who chose fiction as a special field, at the meeting of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. His novels show the transitional influences from romance to realism. His adherence to English models of his time, and also his aim to be original in background, are expressed in a sentence which he wrote after he had finished his first novel, Wieland, in 1798:

⁸ The Algerine Captive, or the Adventures of Doctor Updike Underhill, six years a prisoner among the Algerines (Walpole, 1797); Modern Chivalry, or Adventures of Captain John Farrago and Teague O'Regan, his Servant (Philadelphia, 1792; 1796; 2 vols.).

When a mental comparison is made between this and the mass of novels, I am inclined to be pleased with my own production. But when the objects of comparison are changed, and I revolve the transcendent merits of Caleb Williams, my pleasure is diminished, and is preserved from a total extinction only by the reflection that this performance is the first.*

The life of this first American novelist has been told discursively, but inadequately as regards vital information, by his friend, William Dunlap. Unfortunately, the sources of the biographer's material—many letters and journals—were not liberally used by him, and may have perished with the mass of his own literary remains. Like the pioneer painter, Benjamin West, Brown came from Quaker stock, which seemed to scorn all aesthetic delights; yet, in the sweet sanity and peace of temperament which characterize this sect there existed the best soil for fruitage of the imagination. Brown, however, had other inheritance which gave him strong emotions and fancies; for in his veins Norman blood mingled with that of England.

* William Dunlap, Life of Charles Brockden Brown (1815), Vol. I, p. 107.

His uncle, from whom he derived his middle name, held positions of honor in early Philadelphia history. He was "the skilful conveyancer and great scrivener" who framed the articles of agreement for the Philadelphia Library Company, instituted by Franklin, in 1731. The family story regarding this uncle's youth, and his emigration to America, was a favorite with his nephew, and is of general interest. When he was a lad studying law in England, he was apprenticed to a celebrated barrister who was at odds with the government of Charles II. Accidentally, the apprentice was hidden in the room where his employer and some friends were discussing a plot against the government. When the youth was discovered, various suggestions were made regarding his fate; for he could not be left at liberty with such a weighty secret. To save him from death, his employer testified that he was of "too feeble a mind" to cause any injury to them by his knowledge, but he agreed that the boy, for safety, should be shipped to the American colonies.

Our pioneer novelist was born in Philadelphia, January, 1771, probably at 117 South Second Street; this was his father's home for many years. He was weak physically, but studious at a very early age. According to family tradition, he could be left alone for hours on the floor at home, even as a baby, if he were provided with a book. One of the chief delights of his childhood was to climb upon the chairs and tables and study the few maps upon the walls. At ten years he showed an unusual maturity of mind. An incident is told to illustrate this, which suggests a touch of priggishness in him. A visitor had aroused his resentment by calling him "boy," and questioning his statements of facts. The child replied: "Why does he call me boy? Does he not know that it is neither size nor age, but understanding that makes the man? I could ask him an hundred questions none of which he could answer."⁶

Robert Proud was a famous schoolmaster of Philadelphia, as well as its local historian. To his school young Brown was sent to exert his already strained mind and nerves by close application to classic texts. Fortunately, the schoolmaster had an understanding, rare for that day, of wholesome educational methods. He realized the needs of his pupil, and insisted that he should often leave his books and go into the woods, where nature would be both a doctor and a teacher. Although to the boy the walks often proved a time for lonely, gloomy fancies, yet he gained impressions of fine scenery which were used afterward in his writing.

⁶ Dunlap's Life of Brown, Vol. I, pp. 12, 13. Jared Sparks, A Library of American Biography, New York, 1839. Vol. I, pp. 122; article on Brown by William H. Prescott.

He was early convinced that he would be an author, and began with imitations of Homer and Virgil, Ossian and Milton. American history next attracted him, and he wrote some epics to celebrate the discovery of America and the deeds of his heroes, Cortez and Pizarro. He did not venture, at first, to break through all custom and distress his family by the choice of literature as a profession; so he followed the example of his father and three brothers, and studied law. Meanwhile he had yearnings for literature, spent much of his time in spinning fancies and literary hopes, and contributed some verses and essays to local journals. He told, with disgust, of the fate of a "Poetical Address to Franklin," which had been sent to an Edentown newspaper:

The blundering printer from his zeal or his ignorance, or perhaps from both, substituted the name of Washington for that of Franklin. Washington, therefore, stands arrayed in awkward colours. Philosophy smiles to behold her darling son; she turns with horror and disgust from those who have won the laurel of victory in the field of battle to this her favorite candidate who had never participated in such bloody glory and whose fame was derived from the conquest of philosophy alone.*

The most absurd qualities were thus attributed to

* William Dunlap, Life of Charles Brockden Brown (New York, 1815), Vol. I, p. 17, 18.

Washington, until the poem became an unintelligible farce, and was even regarded by some readers as an intentional insult. More successful was the young author in the series of essays called "The Rhapsodist," which began in the Columbian Magazine in April, 1789.

The pleasure which Brown found in writing, and in the companionship of his friends of literary tastes, especially William Wilkinson and Dr. Elihu Smith,⁷ induced him to give up law and devote himself exclusively to literature. The effect of this decision upon his family and acquaintances may be realized from a comment of a local historian, after the novelist's death :

Mr. Brown had received an education which qualified him for the profession which secured wealth free from the risks of commerce,—the profession, from which proceeded our statesmen, legislators, and rulers;—yet he preferred the toilsome occupation of book-making, from the pure love of literature and a benevolent desire to benefit his fellow-creatures.⁸

The first year after Brown gave up the law for literature he spent largely in New York, ⁷ The death of Wilkinson in early manhood was a great grief to Brown. Dr. Elihu Smith was at this time studying medicine in Philadelphia. With another friend, William Johnson, a lawyer, he made a home in New York, to which Brown came for a part of the year 1797.

⁸ See Henry Simpson, Eminent Philadelphians (Philadelphia, 1859).

passing some of the time with Dr. Smith, and also becoming an inmate of the home of William Dunlap. Evidence of the latter fact has been found in a manuscript letter from Brown to Dunlap in the possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, which is here given by permission. It was written after Brown's return to Philadelphia. The morose and extravagant tone of self-depreciation was characteristic of the writer:

Philadelphia, Jan'y 1, 1798.

To William Dunlap, Care of Dunlap & Judah, Pearl St.,
New York.

It is nearly twelve months since I parted from you. I believe I have not written to you nor you written to me since. How shall I account for your silence? The task is an easy one. I was not an object of sufficient importance to justify the trouble. My infirmities & follies were too rooted for you to hope their cure. Admonition & remonstrance under your own hand, would be superfluous to this end. Hence your habitual reserve & silence of the pen suffered no interruption on my account. I lived with you six months. During that time you, no doubt, scrutinized my conduct & character with accuracy. You must have formed some conclusions respecting me, but you thought proper to be silent respecting them. You weighed the opposite advantages of communication & reserve. You decided in favour of the latter. I revere your rectitude, my friend, in as great a degree as I detest my own imbecility: but it is allowable for me to question the propriety of your decision.

Communication, it appears to me, was your duty. Whatever was my depravity, it did not sink me below deserving a mere verbal effort for my restoration. Had I led the way you would have followed. There needed only an introduction of the topic by me. Had I mentioned my opinion of your incommunicative temper & importuned you for a knowledge of your sentiments, the barrier would have been removed. It is true I was criminal in failing to employ this means. Were you exempt from blame in making these means necessary? Think of this, my friend, if I may still call you by that name. Surely, all esteem for me has not perished in your bosom. . . .

I think upon the life of last winter with self-loathing almost insupportable. Alas! my friend, few consolations of a self-approving mind have fallen to my lot. . . . I am sometimes apt to think that few human beings have drunk so deeply of the cup of self-abhorrence as I have. . . . Whether it will end but with my life I know not.

I have written to Elihu and informed him of the transactions of the last few months. You will of course be made acquainted with them. I know not whether your engagements have allowed you to prosecute any similar undertaking. I have longed for a knowledge of your views & situation. I am not entitled to know this but by second hand. I make no demands upon you. As I am, you despise me. I shall die, as I have lived, a victim to perverse and incurable habits. My progress in knowledge has enlightened my judgment, without adding to my power.

I have done nothing to deserve the esteem of your wife. I do not therefore expect it. That is no reason which [sic] I should refuse her my respect. She is in the highest degree entitled to it; present it therefore to her.

C. B. Brown.

In a note, signed "W. Dunlap," below this letter, is the comment: "So at certain moments could think & write one of the purest & best beloved of men."⁹ Such a letter, and others from which we shall quote, are of great assistance in interpreting the strange haunting fancies and moods which assailed Brown as novelist.

Dr. Elihu Smith exerted much influence in giving poise to the emotions of Brown, and in urging him to definite literary work. The two men were contrasts in many ways. The physician was absolutely sane and practical, and his geniality has passed into many literary records. At his apartments in Pine Street the Friendly Club met—a band of young lawyers, physicians, and authors. Literature was becoming fashionable, but the media for its expression were few. Clubs in various centers started magazines, which were generally short-lived, but served their purpose as a means of expression for the members. Such was the aim of the familiar Medical Repository, established in 1794 by Dr. Smith and two other physicians. By contact with such patient, wise minds, Brown found an incentive to write both essays and fiction.

Yellow fever was a scourge in America during the last decade of the eighteenth century.

⁹ A note in Dunlap's manuscript journal, April 12, 1798, says that he was then visiting Brown in Philadelphia at 119 South Second Street.

With other portents of evil, it increased the emotional ferment which was shown in many directions. This disease had raged in Philadelphia in 1793; its scenes of devastation furnished Brown with the germ for his novel Arthur Mervyn. His family left the city to escape contagion. When the plague attacked New York in 1798, Brown was there with his friend, Dr. Elihu Smith. His brothers urged him to return to Philadelphia, but he refused to leave his friend. They adopted sanitary safeguards and faced the danger. A strange appeal came to their humanity, and proved a fatal risk. Among the friends who had been in their circle in New York for a year was Dr. Joseph Scandella. Just as he was about to leave for Italy, he learned that two of his compatriots, a young girl and her mother, were ill and in want in Philadelphia. He went to their aid, remained until both had died of yellow fever, and then returned to New York, to find that he could not secure lodging in any inn, as he was already showing signs of the disease. Dr. Smith took this friend to his own home, hoping to cure him and not become infected; but the fever attacked both Dr. Smith and Brown. The latter recovered, but found that both the physicians had died. This loss of friendship was an overwhelming grief to Brown, but he rallied his mental powers and tried to write something worthy of his friend who had been such an inspiration. The home of William Dunlap, at Perth Amboy, again became his residence for a brief time. Afterward he returned to Philadelphia.

Before the death of Dr. Smith, Brown had written a dialogue-essay, "The Rights of Women," which was printed in book-form, under the title Alcuin.¹⁰ The "Advertisement" in the front of the book is dated March, 1787, and is signed by "E. H. Smith," who states that the material was "put in his hands for publication by a friend." The argument of Alcuin was in behalf of more justice for women, equal suffrage, and better education. The woman maintained that, if the intelligence of men was superior to that of women, it was only a proof "in how mournful a degree that capacity has been neglected or perverted." In the same magazine had appeared, two months earlier and unsigned, "The Man at Home"—a series of rhapsodic musings. In June of the same year the first chapters of Arthur Merwyn; or, Memoirs of the Year 1793, were printed in this journal, although the book was not finished and published until the next year.

Such scattering publications in magazines prefaced the printing of his first book in fiction. On the cover of this Weekly Magazine were solicited "Proposals for the publication of a novel, Sky Walk, or the Man Unknown to Himself." Brown, who was the author of this story, accepted the most promising of the proposals—namely, that which bore the larger share of the expense—and the publication began. When the book was nearly completed in press, the printer died. His executors refused to finish the work, or to sell the sheets at any reasonable price; so the effort was useless for the time. A reference in the manuscript journal of Dunlap, April 11, 1798, suggests that this first, unfinished novel contained the germ, at least, of Brown's later story Edgar Huntley, Dunlap wrote in his journal: "Call on Brown who goes with me to bookseller's & gives me some account of his 'Sky Walk,' he says it is founded on Somnambulism."

¹⁰ Alcuin: A Dialogue (New York, 1798; 77 pages). This was first printed as "The Rights of Women" in the Weekly Magazine of Original Essays, Fugitive Pieces and Interesting Intelligence, Vol. I, 1798 (Philadelphia).

More information of a personal nature about Brown, and his romantic interests during this year, is furnished in extracts from Dunlap's manuscript journals. The first is dated "May 1st; Call with Smith & my wife to see Miss Potts, C. B. B.'s wished-for." Again: "May 3rd; Miss Potts drinks tea with us." For some reason, in spite of the hospitality of his friends and his own ardor of temperament, Brown did not secure his "wished-for" as his wife. Possibly the gloom of spirit which followed during the next few months, and which was indicated in the letter to Dunlap already quoted, was enhanced by this disappointment.

If success be gauged by the praise of a few friends, and by sufficient sale of books to pay the expenses of their publication, then Brown was successful during the next two years; for there issued from the press four volumes of fiction in 1798 and 1799. Wieland; or, The Transformation, the first to appear, has remained in memory as Brown's most representative work in fiction. It contained unquestioned evidence of originality and imaginative skill; but his later, rapidly published novels failed to fulfil the promise of this first book. Wieland is a pot-pourri of strange sensations, isolated scenes of tragic strength, bits of fine description, and labored, discursive style. It would be hard to find a story with more fantastic, incredible incidents, which the reader is supposed to accept as "supernaturalities," although it is not difficult to find simple explanation for many of the absurd devices of the novelist's imagination. There are serious dissertations upon a theory of self-combustion and the elixir of life; hypnotism and ventriloquism combine to make an interesting villain. The author is not willing, however, to let the reader accept the palpable explanation of the blighting influence, "the diabolical malice," of this character, Carwin. He seeks to wrap about him a veil of mystery and to introduce him in labored narration :

One afternoon I was standing in the door of my house when I marked a person passing close to the edge of the bank that was in front. His gait was awkward and rustic. His form was ungainly and disproportioned. Shoulders broad and square, breast sunken, his head drooping, his body of uniform breadth, supported by long and lank legs, were the ingredients of his frame. His garb was not ill-adapted to such a figure. A slouched hat, tarnished by the weather, a coat of thick gray cloth, cut and wrought, as it seemed, by a country tailor, blue worsted stockings, and shoes fastened by thongs, and deeply discolored by dust, which brush had never disturbed, constituted his dress.¹¹

Following this passage is a minute description of the impression made upon the woman by this passer-by, her surprise at his fascinating face, and especially the tremors which thrilled her at the sound of his voice as he asked for a drink of buttermilk from the dairy-maid: "When he uttered the words 'for sweet charity's sake,' I dropped the cloth which I held in my hand, my heart overflowed with sympathy, and my eyes with unbidden tears." Such florid emotionalism was largely typical of the writing of that period, but it found an extremist in Brown. A recent historian of American literature has said, with justice: "Brown frequently raised a superstructure of mystery on a basis ludicrously weak."¹²

¹¹ Wieland, or the Transformation (New York, 1798), chap. 6, pp. 58-60.

The real plot of the story was based upon the hallucination of a father that he had received command, from supernatural sources, to murder his family. It is evident that this theme was suggested to him by an occurrence just before the tale was written. This fact is attested in two reviews of Brown's novels, especially of Wieland. The American Review and Literary Journal, which was edited in part by Brown, said in an extended notice of Wieland: "The principal incidents, however incredible and shocking, are founded on well authenticated facts, and sublime and tragical in the highest degree."¹³ A tragedy similar in general outlines to that narrated by Brown occurred in New York the year before Wieland was published. As late as 1819, in a survey of Brown's work in the North American Review,¹⁴ the critic commended the novelist's choice of American scenes and added: "Sometimes the author takes advantage of a recent event amongst ourselves, as in Wieland, which is too shocking to receive any aid from exaggeration or to lose any interest from its notoriety."

¹² Henry A. Beers, Initial Studies in American Letters, New York, 1891, p. 65.

¹³ American Review and Literary Journal (New York, 1801), Vol. I. See also New York Weekly Magazine, Vol. II, pp. 20-28, for the actual facts of such tragedy.

¹⁴ North American Review, June, 1819, Vol. IX, pp. 58-64.

Within a few months after the first novel was issued the second appeared, Ormond, or The Secret Witness. The villain, who gave his name to the title, was clearly modeled after William Godwin's Falkland in Caleb Williams. In truth, the two novels are not dissimilar in plan and effect. The theme of seduction was treated awkwardly, amid the peaceful environment of Philadelphia. The character of Constantia Dudley, however, is fairly well drawn; she is superior to his other women. She was too prone to "ardent meditation," but through her words Brown expressed some sensible ideas on women's education.¹⁵ It was this character of Constantia, and the novel in which she was outlined, that especially "delighted and deeply affected" Shelley, when, under the spell of Godwin's influence, he reveled in tales of gruesomeness amid surroundings of real life.¹⁶

In this second novel there are some sentences descriptive of the yellow fever in Philadelphia, but the third in time, Arthur Mervyn; or, Memoirs of the Year 1793, owed its chief interest to a dramatic portrayal of this fateful year in Philadelphia. It was the most ambitious of all his stories, and at the same time the most involved and prolix. In some descriptive passages the realism is so strong that it stirs the feelings of a reader today, in spite of his recognition that the novel is a good example of sensationalism. In criticism, discriminating and appreciative, W. P. Trent has expressed the true attitude of a reader to this special novel and the general estimate of Brown in fiction:

¹⁵ Ormond, or The Secret Witness (New York, 1798), pp. 31, 32.

¹⁶ Edward Dowden, Life of Shelley (London, 1886), Vol. I, pp. 472, 473.

It is impossible to surrender one's self to the illusion that such adventures could have happened in Brown's prim birthplace; but it is easy under the influence of his strong imagination to walk the deserted streets of the plague-stricken city and to enter its forbidding houses tenanted by the dying and the dead. If this be true today, it seems hardly fair to sneer at the men and women who a century ago regarded Brown as a great and moving writer. His models were their standards, and they were right in perceiving that he measured well up to the Godwins and the Radcliffes. They had not progressed far enough to demand a sense of humor, an artistic ordering of material, susceptibility to the charms of nature, and a subtle psychological analysis. They knew that their emotions had been deeply stirred, and that in some particulars at least the life around them had been faithfully set down.¹⁷

Doubtless the fearful experiences of the fever,

¹⁷ W. P. Trent, A History of American Literature (New York, 1903), p. 211.

which had come upon Brown in New York, increased his imaginative pictures of the conditions in Philadelphia, although history has verified many of his statements. His passages of narration have been compared fittingly with Defoe's picture of the London plague. A selection may be chosen to illustrate the crude, yet haunting, portrayal:

. . . . In proportion as I drew near the city, the tokens of its calamitous condition became more apparent. Every farm-house was filled with supernumerary tenants; fugitives from home; and haunting the skirts of the road, eager to detain every passenger with inquiries after news. . . . The market-place and each side of this magnificent avenue were illuminated, as before, by lamps; but between the verge of the Schuylkill and the heart of the city, I met not more than a dozen figures; and these were ghost-like, wrapped in cloaks from behind which they cast upon me glances of wonder and suspicion; and, as I approached, changed their course, to avoid touching me. Their clothes were sprinkled with vinegar; and their nostrils defended from contagion by some powerful perfume.²⁸

Then follows a description of the entrance of the dread friend of the infected city—the slow, stealthily-moving hearse:

The driver was seated on it. I stood still, to mark his visage, and to observe the course which he proposed to take. Presently, a coffin, borne by two men, issued from the house. The driver was a negro but his companions were white. Their features were marked by ferocious indifference to danger or pity.

²⁸ Arthur Mervyn; or, Memoirs of the Year 1793 (Philadelphia, 1799), chap. 15, pp. 143-45.

One of them, as he assisted in thrusting the coffin into the cavity provided for it, said, "I'll be damned if I think the poor dog was quite dead. It wasn't the fever that ailed him, but the sight of the girl and her mother on the floor. I wonder how they all got into that room. What carried them there?"

The other surlily muttered, "Their legs to be sure."

"But what should they hug together in one room for?"

"To save us trouble to be sure."

"And I thank them with all my heart; but damn it, it wasn't right to put him in his coffin before the breath was fairly gone. I thought the last look he gave me, told me to stay a few minutes."

"Pshaw! He could not live. The sooner dead the better for him; as well as for us. Did you mark how he eyed us, when we carried away his wife and daughter? I never cried in my life, since I was knee-high, but curse me if I ever felt in better tune for the business than just then. Hey!" continued he, looking up and observing me standing a few paces distant, and listening to their discourse, "What's wanted? Anybody dead?"

Such a narrative of a tragic situation, although overdrawn and melodramatic, has a power which attracts and, also, repels. These low, callous grave-diggers, with their latent humanity, and the villain Welbeck, are depicted with a realism that is painful. During these years, chronicled in Brown's novels, there seemed to be an emotional ferment in many parts of America. Curiosity and semi-fear, not unlike the signs of childhood, assailed the mind of the country. Contemporaneous with the new interest in science among the educated classes were the feverish speculations among the ignorant about clairvoyance, somnambulism, ventriloquism, and other mysteries on the borderland between fancy and reality. Quacks of all kinds were ubiquitous, and credulity reigned. Such evidences of mental whims and fears were reflected in embryonic drama and fiction. They characterized many of the newspaper columns that were satirized by the Hartford Wits in The Echo.

As Brown introduced ventriloquism and speculations on the elixir of life into Wieland, so he chose somnambulism for the germ-idea of his fourth novel, Edgar Huntley; or, Memoirs of a Sleepwalker.¹⁹ There were also scenes of adventure here, especially of Clithero, sleep-walker and grave-digger, and culminating in the encounter of the hero with a panther. This has suggested Cooper's famous scene in The Pioneers. In the preface to this fourth novel Brown emphasized his determination to depict American scenery and foster native fiction:

One merit the writer may at least claim;—that of calling forth the passions and engaging the sympathy of the reader by means hitherto unemployed by preceding authors. Puerile superstition and exploded manners, Gothic castles and chimeras, are the materials usually employed for this end. The incidents of Indian hostility, and the perils of the Western wilderness, are far more suitable; and for a native of America to overlook these would admit of no apology.

¹⁹ Edgar Huntley; or, Memoirs of a Sleepwalker (Philadelphia, 1799, 1800).

Brown and Cooper have been compared as painters of Indian character, the claims of Brown being based upon certain scenes in Edgar Huntley. Brown overlooked the nobler qualities poetized by Philip Freneau. He portrayed the Indian as cruel and malign, and used him as a means of increasing the elements of horror in his story. Cooper, on the other hand, idealized the Indian type, emphasizing the more romantic traits. These three early authors, Freneau, Brown, and Cooper, portrayed diverse qualities of the Indian and, in their totality, revealed the red man as known to the pioneer settlers, when the Indian still lived on the borders of civilization, and his haunts and habits were familiar.

The wildly incredible adventures of his hero, Edgar Huntley, in the mountain districts of eastern Pennsylvania aroused criticism as well as interest among readers. Brown realized the justice of the former, and wrote to his brother James:

Your remarks upon the gloominess and out-of-nature incidents of "Huntley," if they be not just in their full extent, are doubtless such as some readers will make, which alone is sufficient reason for dropping the doleful tone and assuming a cheerful one, or at least, substituting moral causes and daily incidents in place of the prodigious and the singular. I shall hereafter fall into that strain.

To carry out this intention, he abandoned weird and adventuresome incidents, and adopted a form of tame sentimentality in his last two novels, Clara Howard and Jane Talbot.²⁰ The same plot, based upon a lost child and mistaken identity, and some of the same characters were introduced into both Edgar Huntley and Clara Howard. The heroine, of the latter, Mary Wilmot, supporting herself and her brother by her needle, was a familiar type of womanhood in that day. The letters of Jane Talbot and Henry Colden make a weak love-story.

In Edgar Huntley are two sentences worth quoting, for they seem to express the author's own defects in mental poise and emotional restraint:

My judgment was for the time, sunk into imbecility and confusion! . . . Thus I have told thee a bloody and disastrous tale: when thou reflectest on the mildness of my habits, my antipathy to scenes of violence and bloodshed, my unacquaintance with the use of fire-arms, and the motives of a soldier, thou wilt scarcely allow credit to my story.²¹

²⁰ Clara Howard; or, The Enthusiasm of Love (Philadelphia, 1801); Jane Talbot (Philadelphia, New York, London, 1801).

²¹ Edgar Huntley, Vol. I, p. 210; Vol. II, p. 207.

Upon these six novels rests the reputation of Charles Brockden Brown as a novelist. He failed to meet the requirements of fiction of a high order; he created only a few strong characters; he was discursive and stilted in diction. As an example of the last fault, we recall the sentence on the heroine of Ormond: "Constantia enjoyed, in their full extent, the felicities of health and self-approbation."²² In extenuation, we must remember that these novels were written when Brown was a young man—for he was only thirty when the last appeared; that he wrote with fatal rapidity; and that he lacked the wisdom of rejection and the aid of critical advice. In his mature life he repented, too mournfully, of these early novels, and repressed the fancies with which his imagination was stored. Without question, his mind and imagination could produce effective scenes. The author's temperament, especially shown in his youth and early manhood, and his proneness to attacks of melancholy and gruesome fancies, explain largely the characteristics of his fiction. To these individual traits must be added the fashion of the day in literature, and his attempts to follow the English imaginative writers who were favorites of the hour.

²² Ormond, or The Secret Witness, p. 32. Mary Shelley commented on Jane Talbot as a "very stupid book," etc; see Edward Dowden's Life of Shelley (London, 1886), Vol. I, pp. 472, 473.

Brown entered the field of fiction with diffidence and fear of censure from Americans whom he esteemed; for this form of literature was then often condemned as immoral, or too frivolous to be read. In the Jefferson Papers, at the Library of Congress, there is an interesting letter from Brown to Thomas Jefferson, asking his acceptance of Wieland, and explaining, with tiresome verbosity, the reasons why he ventured to write a novel, and to present it to the statesman, whom he much admired. By permission, I quote extracts here from the letter:

After some hesitation, a stranger to the person, though not to the character of Thomas Jefferson, ventures to intreat his acceptance of the volume by which this is accompanied. . . . I am conscious, however, that this form of composition may be regarded by you with indifference and contempt, that social & intellectual theories, that the history of facts in the processes of nature & the operations of government may appear to you the only laudable pursuits: that fictitious narratives, in their own nature, or in the manner in which they have been hitherto conducted, may be thought not to deserve notice, & that, consequently, whatever may be the merit of my book as a fiction yet it is to be condemn'd because it is a fiction.

I need not say that my own opinions are different. I am therefore obliged to hope that an artful display of incidents, the powerful delineation of characters & the train of eloquent & judicious reasoning which may be combined in a fictitious work will be regarded by Thomas Jefferson with as much respect as they are regarded by me. . . .

No man holds a performance which he has deliberately offered to the world in contempt: but, if he be a man of candour & discernment, his favourable judgment of his own work will always be diffidence and fluctuation. I confess I foster the hope that Mr. Jefferson will be induced to open the book that is here offered him: that when he has begun it, he will find himself prompted to continue & that he will not think the time employ'd upon it tediously or uselessly consumed.

With more than this I dare not flatter myself. That he will be pleased in any uncommon degree & that, by his recommendation, he will contribute to diffuse the knowledge of its author, & facilitate a favorable reception to future performances, is a benefit far beyond the expectations, though certainly, the object of the fondest wishes of
Charles B. Brown.²⁸

One who reads this letter by Brown is naturally curious to know what reception the letter and book won from Jefferson. His answer was brief, noncommittal in a way, yet promising some degree of appreciation. The answer, however, was delayed until Jefferson's return to Philadelphia, and was dated January 15, 1800—more than a year after Brown's letter.

I receiv'd on my arrival here some days ago the copy of the book you were so kind as to send me together with your letter, for which be pleased to accept my thanks.

²⁸ Jefferson Papers, Series II, Vol. V, No. 46. The letter is dated December 25, 1798 (45 Pine Street, New York).

As soon as I am in a situation to admit it (which is hardly the case here) I shall read it, & I doubt not with great pleasure, some of the most agreeable moments of my life have been spent in reading works of imagination, which have this advantage over history that the incidents of the former may be dressed in the most interesting form, while those of the latter must be confined to fact: they cannot therefore present virtue in the best & vice in the worst forms possible, as the former may.

I have the honor to be with great consideration, Sir,

Your most obed' serv't,

Th. Jefferson.²⁴

Although classified as America's first novelist, Brown by his personality exerted as great influence upon early literature as by this concrete form of writing. For the youth of his own day and the next generation he left a potent example by renouncing opportunities in law and business, and devoting himself to letters as a profession, in spite of censure and sacrifices. Prescott lays special stress upon Brown's influence in this way upon the young men of the next generation, who were inspired to test their gifts.²⁵ After he had finished his brief career as novelist, he devoted the rest of his life to editing journals, designed especially to create a taste for good reading among the common people.

²⁴ Jefferson Papers, Series I, Vol. VII, No. 305 (Library of Congress).

²⁵ A Library of American Biography, Vol. I, p. 180: Prescott on Brown.

Beginning in the year of his greatest success as novelist, 1799, he ventured as editor of The Monthly Magazine and American Review, published in New York. This survived only a year. The previous year he had contributed papers to The Weekly Magazine of Original Essays, Fugitive Pieces and Interesting Intelligence of Philadelphia.²⁶ He may have assisted in editing this journal. The most fruitful years of his work as editor were from 1803 to 1808, when he edited The Literary Magazine and American Register.²⁷ In his opening "Address to the Public," dated September 1, 1803, he made a persuasive plea for support, urging that there is not, at present, any other monthly publication in America, and that a plan of this kind, if well conducted, cannot fail of being highly conducive to amusement and instruction. There are many, therefore, it is hoped, who, when such a herald as this knocks at their door, will open it without reluctance, and admit a visitant who calls only once a month; who talks upon every topic; whose company may be dismissed or resumed, and who may be made to prate or to hold his tongue at pleasure; a companion he will be, possessing one companionable property, in the highest degree, that is to say, a desire to please.

True to his promise, the editor seemed to "talk upon every topic," but, amid much that was ²⁶ See earlier pages of this chapter for his contributions.

²⁷ This journal was issued from the press of Conrad, of Philadelphia. The publishing house had branches for distribution in Norfolk and Baltimore.

trivial, there were some scholarly papers on affairs and letters, showing the editor's information along both lines. Brown was deeply interested in American politics, and wrote clearly and forcefully upon such themes, in a manner quite unlike his florid style in fiction and letters. Throughout his life he was a firm Federalist, yet a great admirer of Jefferson and Hamilton. In later years he criticized the former for his Democratic policies. An excellent linguist, he was able to speak and read French and Spanish with ease. Two of his essays, with translated passages, attracted attention and have been preserved. The first was An Address to the Government of the United States on the Cession of Louisiana to the French and on the Late Breach of Treaty by the Spaniards, including the Translation of a Memorial on the War of St. Domingo, and Cession of Mississippi to France. This passed into a second and revised edition. The next year (1804) he published a translation of A View of the Soil and Climate of the United States of America, with Supplementary Remarks upon Florida, maps etc., by C. F. Volney.²⁸

As such studies in broader fields increased his culture, they caused him to regret his earlier, more puerile attempts at fiction. In the prospectus of his Literary Magazine he expressed the true humility of a man who was acquiring scholarship and looked back upon his work with keen disapproval:

²⁸ Both these pamphlets were published in Philadelphia, 1803, and 1804.

I am far from wishing that my readers should judge of my exertions by my former ones. I have written much, but take much blame to myself for something which I have written and take no praise for anything. I should enjoy a larger share of my own respect, at the present moment, if nothing had ever flowed from my pen, the production of which could be traced to me. A variety of causes induce me to form such a wish, but I am particularly influenced by the consideration that time can scarcely fail of enlarging and refining the powers of a man; while the world is sure to judge of his capabilities and principles at fifty by what he has written at fifteen.

Brown's magazine acquired a fair circulation in New York, as well as in Philadelphia. Joseph Dennie welcomed Brown into the ranks of journalists by a kind reference, in The Portfolio, February 11, 1804, to the editor as "a gentleman whose talents are acknowledged to be of a superior order. As author of the novel, 'Wieland,' he acquired considerable celebrity." Brown had not signed his name either to his "Address to the Public" or to his articles, but his work was quickly recognized. Of this reticence he said in the "Address":

I shall take no pains to conceal my name. Any body may know it who chooses to ask my publisher. I shall not, however, put it at the bottom of this address. My diffidence, as my friends would call it, and my discretion, as my enemies (if I have any) would term it, hinder me from calling out my name in a crowd.

He wrote some historical and literary essays, and secured contributions on natural history, travels, etc. A department of "Remarkable Occurrences" was one feature of the journal, and a column of "Anecdotes" sought to lighten the mass of serious writing. Unfortunately, Brown lacked the sense of humor. Such a faculty would have aided him in giving a more entertaining touch to his journal. In earlier years it might have saved him from some of his more extravagant passages of melodrama. This lack of buoyancy was due, in a measure, to his physical nature. He confessed that he had never known "that lightness and vivacity of mind which the divine flow of health, even in calamity, produces in some men."²⁹

Outwardly his life brightened as the years passed. In 1804 he married Elizabeth Linn, of New York, daughter of a well-known clergyman and sister of another, Rev. John Blair Linn, of Philadelphia. The latter was a man of literary tastes, who had written two books of passing fame.³⁰ The year after his marriage, Brown

²⁹ W. H. Prescott's Sketch of Brown, Jared Sparks, A Library of American Biography, Vol. I, p. 169.

³⁰ The Powers of Genius: A Poem by John Blair Linn, A.M., Co-Pastor of First Presbyterian Church in the City of wrote to Dunlap of his home happiness, but also of his haunting fear that it might not last.⁸¹ The birth of twin sons seemed to rouse him, for a time, from his morbid fancies. He found a new incentive in living, and edited and wrote with zeal and encouragement. Proof of this more normal state of mind is given in a manuscript letter, in the possession of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, which is printed by permission. The letter was written to his wife from Albany, June 17, 1806, where he had gone to visit his sisters. He begins the letter with an account of the journey by boat:

I left New York last Thursday morning & on Monday about twelve got within twelve miles of this place. There being no expectation of reaching town before night, I gladly got on shore & walked the rest of the way. I had scarcely begun my walk when the eclipse began. I sat down on the side of a hill from whence there was a wide prospect of this great river and its lofty shores & enjoyed the grandest and most awful spectacle which I ever witnessed. . . . I have had a great deal of conversation with our sisters, in which, however, as yet all the talk was on my side. They seem'd to partake of all your pride and fondness for our little ones. . . .

Philadelphia (Philadelphia, 1801; Bourville Castle, Philadelphia, 1802 (?)).

⁸¹ "My companion is all that an husband can wish for, and, in short, as to my own personal situation, I have nothing to wish for but that it may last (Life of Brown, Vol. II, p. 113).

My fond anticipations of a letter from you were not disappointed. I found one here on my arrival, which assures me of your welfare. You confirm my prognostics that the lovely babes will scamper about house, by the time of my return. I am grieved that you still enjoy so little assistance & I am very glad you have Susan D. I have no doubt we shall soon have Massy back again & her excellence will only show the brighter by comparison with the defects of others. I will write every day. Love to thy dear self.

In a postscript his wife is told to "send the Reflector to the printer," with specific directions as to his office. Like all of Brown's handwriting, this letter shows wonderful delicacy and evenness both in the formation of the letters and also in the spacing.

The evidence of fatal disease of the lungs, in 1808, brought on a return of brooding. After a journey through New York and western New England he seemed to have temporary relief, and undertook more writing with a zeal which was almost desperate. Two years before, he had arranged with his publisher, Conrad, to bring out a semiannual compendium of reprinted articles on politics, science, art, and literature. This was known as The American Register or General Repository of History, Politics, and Science. It lived through seven volumes, from 1806 to 1810. It may be found at many libraries, and evidently had a wide circulation for that period, and an influence in promoting intelligence on world-affairs in an age that was provincial.

The increase of his family by two more children gave Brown added joy, but also anxiety, for he realized that his own years of life were few, and that he could leave no adequate income for his family. He disliked the phrases allied with death, and always spoke of the future for his wife in euphemisms, such as: "You must do this when I am asleep," or, "Remember this when I am absent."³² As his physical power grew less, his mind seemed more alert and productive. He wrote until the last day of life.

Among the many literary remains were French classics in translation, maps and data for a work on geography, architectural drawings, and the romantic History of Carsol, Sketches of a History of the Carrils and Ormes included with Jessica and Memoirs of Stephen Calvert, in the memoir by Dunlap.³³ A manuscript poem, "L'Amoroso," which was given by his son, William Linn Brown, to Frank M. Etting, Esq., is in the Chamberlain collection at the Boston Public Library. It illustrates the prevailing sentimentality of his writing. A portion is here quoted:

³² Dunlap, Life of Brown, Vol. II, p. 188.

³³ Ibid., Vol. I, pp. 170-262.

From pleasure's walks and market-places;
Stilly Groves and lonely Hills;
From gay carousals, thronging faces,
Moonlight Glades and warbling rills;
From fighting fields and stormy Seas;
From courtly pomp and war's array;
From State turmoils and letter'd Ease;
Come, my enamoured Soul! away!
From haunts that moonstruck Fancy woos:
Where Nymphs resort, and Muses roam,
From all that vulgar dreams abuse,
Come home, Exstatic Thought, come home!

The death of Brown, in February, 1810, attracted very little attention in the newspapers of Philadelphia and New York. Brief notices only may be found in the journals of the day. Even his burial-place was not located with absolute certainty until a short time ago, when a question elicited the following statement from Mr. George Vaux:

The interment was in Friends' Burial Ground, Arch & Fourth Streets, Philadelphia, 2nd mo. 22, 1810; age thirty-nine years; disease, decay; Locality, row 18, Grave 16; District, Southern. The locality has no significance—all the early grave mounds in this ground were levelled about seventy years ago and no interments earlier than 1848 can be identified.*

Two attempts to revive an interest in Brown's

* See Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, Vol. XXX, No. 118 (1906), p. 242. This fact was found in an original record in Friends' Library.

personality and novels met with only limited success. A complete edition of his fiction was issued in Boston in 1827, and an edition, edited by Mr. David McKay, was published in Philadelphia in 1887. During the last five years more research has been made for facts about his life and influence, in accord with the general awakening to the historical value of such literary data.³⁵ There can be no doubt that English readers and reviewers showed more interest in Brown, for a century and a half after his death, than Americans have ever proclaimed. Three volumes of his fiction, including some tales already printed and other posthumous writing, were published in London in 1822, under the title *Carwin, the Biloquist and Other American Tales and Pieces By Charles Brockden Brown, Author of Wieland, Ormond, Arthur Mervyn, &c.*³⁶

Because of this dearth of interest among Americans in the past, there is a special significance in a highly-colored article in Blackwood's Edinburgh Review for October, 1824, signed "X. Y. Z.," treating the life and writings of Brown. The tone is one of reproach to America for her indifference, until England had brought ³⁵ A monograph with detailed study of Brown's novels has been written by Martin S. Vilas (1904); see the Bibliography.

³⁶ These volumes may be found in the Library of Congress.

Brown to public notice. Of the personality of the novelist the reviewer wrote:

He lived in Eleventh street (we mention this for the information of his townsmen—not one in a thousand of whom knew it; of his countrymen not one in a million of whom, out of ATHENS, ever would know it, but for us) between Walnut and Chestnut—on the eastern side—in a low, dirty, two-story brick house; standing a little in from the street, with never a tree nor a shrub near it—lately in the occupation of—or as a Yankee would say improved by an actor-man, whose name was Darling.”

He was a tall man—with a powerful frame—and little or no flesh. It was impossible to pass him in the street, without stopping to look at him. His pale, sallow, strange complexion, straight black hair—“black as death,”—the melancholy, broken-hearted look of his eyes, his altogether extraordinary face,—if seen once, has never been forgotten. He would be met, week after week,—month after month,—walking to and fro in his native town, for hours and hours together on some unfrequented street—generally at a very early hour in the morning, lost in thought and looking like a shipwrecked man. Nobody knew him, nobody cared for him (till we took up his cause) he was only an author—yet, when we have described him, everybody in Philadelphia will recollect him.

Much of this description sounds like the figment of a modern journalist’s imagination; yet many of the facts, are correct, and some of the surmises cannot easily be disproved.

” This account tallies with the description of Brown by Sully, the artist; see Scharf and Westcott, History of Philadelphia, Vol. III, p. 1981.

The novels of Brown are of historical interest in tracing the development of American fiction which followed within a few years—the work of Irving, Cooper, Poe, and Hawthorne. Before the death of Brown, the Salmagundi Papers and Knickerbocker History of New York had been published. Minor ventures in fiction had been made by Irving, Paulding, and their comrades. Irving met Brown, and was impressed by his patience and aspiration. He acknowledged his indebtedness to this early fictionist for an example of courage and literary purpose. The masters of fiction who followed Brown were able to use material similar to his, in fancy and character-delineation; but they gave to their fiction both reality and effectiveness. It was the lack of such artistic execution that reduced Brown's romances to extravaganzas. He had a fertile fancy but lacked constructive faculty. His power of imagination was often virile, but it was never fully developed and trained. He produced only the germs of national fiction, from which there evolved, within a few years, such effective tales as Rip Van Winkle, The Gold Bug, and The Hall of Fantasy. In both fiction and essays on political and literary themes, Brown evidenced some originality of thought and an impulse of patriotism which helped to promulgate a love of literature among his countrymen.

BIBLIOGRAPHY

BIBLIOGRAPHY

I. GENERAL BOOKS OF REFERENCE AND INTRODUCTORY CHAPTER

The author, in preparing this Bibliography, has included only the books, periodicals, letters, manuscripts, etc., which she has consulted by personal research or by correspondence; the list is far from exhaustive, but may prove helpful for further studies upon these subjects.

American Poems, Selected and Original. Anon. Litchfield (Connecticut). Preface is dated 1793. This was edited by Dr. Elihu Smith. 8vo.

American Museum, The; or Repository of Ancient and Modern Fugitive Pieces. Philadelphia: Carey, 1787-92.

Columbian Muse, The: A Selection of American Poetry from Various Authors of Established Reputation. Philadelphia, 1794. 12mo.

Columbian Songster, The, and Jovial Companion. New York, 1797. 8vo.

Cyclopaedia of American Literature. By Evert A. Duyckinck, New York, 1866.

The National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans. Compiled by James B. Longacre (Philadelphia), and James Herring (New York), 1835.

Specimens of American Poetry. By Samuel Kettell. Boston, 1829. 12mo. 3 vols.

A Library of American Literature. By E. C. Stedman and E. M. Hutchinson. New York, 1900. 8vo. (Vol. I.)

Illustrated Ballad History of the American Revolution. By Frank Moore. New York, 1870. 4to.

322 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- Songs and Ballads of the Revolution. By Frank Moore. New York, 1856. 12mo.
- American Lands and Letters. By Donald G. Mitchell. New York, 1899. (Vol. I, chaps. 3 and 4.)
- A History of American Literature. By W. P. Trent. New York, 1903. 8vo. (Pp. 22-66.)
- The Literary History of the American Revolution, 1763-1783. By Moses Coit Tyler. 2 vols. New York, 1897. 8vo.
- American Literature (1607-1885). By Charles F. Richardson. New York, 1898. 2 vols. in 1. (Vol. I, chaps. 1-7.)
- Proposals Relating to the Education of Youth in Pennsylvania. By Benjamin Franklin. Philadelphia, 1749. 32 pp. (In library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania and Boston Public Library.)
- A List of Books Written by, or Relating to Benjamin Franklin. Edited by Paul Leicester Ford. Brooklyn, 1889. 8vo.
- The Complete Works of Benjamin Franklin. Edited and compiled by John Bigelow. 10 vols. New York, 1888. Federal Edition, 1906-7.
- The Writings of Benjamin Franklin. Edited by Albert Henry Smyth. 9 vols. New York, 1905-6.
- Benjamin Franklin. By John Bach MacMaster. Boston, 1887. (Chaps. 8, 9.)
- Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania to the Inhabitants of the British Colonies. Philadelphia, 1768; printed same year in Boston and London. 8vo.
- The Boston Gazette and The Country Journal, July 18, 1768: "A Song Now Much in Vogue in North America." (By John Dickinson.)
- Essays on the Constitution of the United States, 1787-1788. Edited by Paul Leicester Ford. Brooklyn, 1892.

- Pamphlets on the Constitution of the United States. Published during Its Discussion by the People, 1787-1788. Edited, with Notes and a Bibliography, by Paul Leicester Ford. Brooklyn, 1888.
- The American Nation: A History. Edited by Albert Bushnell Hart. New York, 1906-7. (Vols. IX, X.)
- A History of the American People. By Woodrow Wilson. New York, 1902. (Vol. III.)
- A History of the People of the United States, from the Revolution to the Civil War. By John Bach McMaster. New York, 1883. (Vol. I, chaps. 1-4.)
- History of the Republic, as Traced in the Writings of Alexander Hamilton and His Contemporaries. Edited by John C. Hamilton. New York, 1859.
- Writings of George Washington. Edited by Worthington C. Ford. New York, 1899. 14 vols.

II. FRANCIS HOPKINSON

WRITINGS BY HOPKINSON

- An Exercise containing a Dialogue and Ode Sacred to the Memory of his Late Majesty Geo. II. Performed at the College of Philadelphia, May 23, 1761. The Ode written and set to Music by Francis Hopkinson, Esq. M.A. of said College. Philadelphia, 1761. 8 pp., sq. 8vo.
- Science. A Poem by Francis Hopkinson. Dedicated to the Trustees and Profs. of College & Academy. Philadelphia, 1762. 4to.
- Two early poems in manuscript: L'Allegro, dedicated to Benjamin Chew, and Il Penseroso, dedicated to Rev. Dr. Smith. Also: An Elegy sacred to the Memory of Mrs. Ann Graeme, July, 1765. (These manuscripts are in the library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.)

324 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- Four Dissertations, on the Reciprocal Advantages of a Perpetual Union between Great Britain and her American Colonies. Written for Mr. Sargent's Prize-Medal. To Which (by Desire) is prefixed an Eulogium, spoken on Delivery of the Medal. Philadelphia, 1766; London, 1766. (Hopkinson wrote one of these dissertations.)
- A Pretty Story Written in the Year of Our Lord 1774 by Peter Grievous, Esq. A.B.C.D.E. Veluti in Speculo. Philadelphia, 1774.
- Reprint as The Old Farm and the New Farm: A Political Allegory, with Introduction and Historic Notes by Benson J. Lossing. New York, 1857; 2d ed., 1864.
- A Prophecy. Philadelphia, 1776.
- The Pennsylvania Magazine or American Monthly Museum. (R. Aitkin.) Philadelphia, 1775. (This contains many of Hopkinson's early writings.)
- Prose Account of the Battle of the Kegs (unsigned). In New Jersey Gazette, January 21, 1778.
- The Pennsylvania Packet, March 4, 1778 ("The Battle of the Kegs"). December 29, 1787, ("The New Roof").
- Battle of the Kegs. A ballad broadside. (No date or place.) In American Antiquarian Society Library.
- Battle of the Kegs. Philadelphia: Oakwood Press, 1866. 8vo.
- Seven Songs for the Harpsichord or Forte Piano. The Words and Music Composed by Francis Hopkinson. Philadelphia, 1788. 8vo.
- An Oration which Might have been Delivered to the Students in Anatomy on the Late Rupture between the Two Schools in this City. Philadelphia, 1789. 19 pp., 4to.
- The Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings of Francis Hopkinson. 3 vols. Philadelphia, 1792. 8vo.

- Two manuscript volumes of "Miscellanies," owned by Mrs. Florence Scovel Shinn, a descendant of Hopkinson.
- Five manuscript volumes of prose writings (many printed in "The Miscellaneous Essays," etc.), owned by the American Philosophical Society.
- One volume of collected writings (some in manuscript, some in print), made by Hopkinson, owned by the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.
- Manuscript letters by Hopkinson to Jefferson in Library of Congress, Jefferson Papers, Series II; also letters to Hopkinson, Series I.
- Manuscript letters by Francis Hopkinson to Franklin, owned by the American Philosophical Society; also letters to Hopkinson.
- Manuscript letters by Hopkinson to several men of his day, and to his family, owned by Mrs. Oliver Hopkinson; also letters to Hopkinson by Washington, Jefferson, Robert Morris, and others.
- The American Museum; or Repository of Ancient & Modern Fugitive Pieces, Prose & Poetical. Philadelphia: Carey. January, 1787: "On Annual White-washings." February, 1787: "Modern Learning exemplified by a Specimen of Collegiate Examination. By the Hon. Francis Hopkinson, esq."
- The Columbian Magazine, May, 1787 (Philadelphia). Design for a candle-case, etc., by Hopkinson.
- Account of the Grand Federal Procession, Philadelphia, July 4, 1788; to which is added a Letter on the same Subject. Philadelphia, 1788.
- The Pennsylvania Packet or The General Advertiser. Philadelphia, 1782-88. Many articles by Hopkinson, signed "Calamus," "Cautious," "One of the People," "A Lover of Candour," "F. H.," etc.

326 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL ON HOPKINSON

- The American Museum, etc. Vol. IX, Appendix, p. 38, 39.
(Elegy by John Swanwick.)
- The Columbian Magazine, May, 1791. Philadelphia. (Obituary and elegies.)
- The Complete Works of Benjamin Franklin. Edited by John Bigelow. New York, 1888. (Vol. VII, p. 294.)
- Delaplaine's Repository of the Lives and Portraits of Distinguished American Characters. Philadelphia, 1815. (Vol. III, pp. 125-39.)
- The National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans, conducted by John B. Longacre (Philadelphia) and James Herring (New York), 1835. (Vol. III.)
- Biography of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence. By John Sanderson. Philadelphia, 1823. (Vol. II, pp. 187-201.)
- Historic Houses of New Jersey. By W. Jay Mills. Philadelphia, 1902. (Pp. 285-89.)
- The Journals of Hugh Gaine, Printer. Edited by Paul Leicester Ford. New York, 1902. (Vol. I, p. 108.)
- The New York Mercury, Printed by Hugh Gaine, Bookseller, Printer and Stationer at the Bible & Crown, in Hanover Square. April 19, 1762. (Advertisement of new edition of "Science: A Poem.")
- The Literary History of Philadelphia. By Ellis Paxson Oberholtzer. Philadelphia, 1906. (Pp. 44, 56, 61, 67, 106, 113, 114.)
- The Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography. 1878. (Vol. II, pp. 314-24; Sketch of Hopkinson by Charles R. Hildeburne.)
- Pennsylvania State Trials. Philadelphia, 1794. (Vol. I, edited by Edmund Hogan. The impeachment and trial of Francis Hopkinson, judge of the Admiralty.)

- Francis Hopkinson and James Lyon. By O. G. Sonneck. Washington, 1905. Large 8vo.
- Military Journal during the American Revolutionary War. By James Thacher. Boston, 1823. (Pp. 146-150; notes about Battle of the Kegs.)
- The Washington-Duché Letters. Edited by Worthington C. Ford. Brooklyn, 1890.
- The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Edited by Paul L. Ford, New York, 1892-9. Vol. III, p. 495, Vol. V, pp. 75-8.
- Letters of John Adams Addressed to his Wife. Edited by Charles Francis Adams. Boston, 1841. (Vol. I, pp. 156, 157.)
- The Literary History of the American Revolution. By Moses Coit Tyler. New York, 1897. (Vol. I, pp. 164-71, 225, 226, 279-92; Vol. II, pp. 134-57, etc.)

III. PHILIP FRENEAU

WRITINGS BY PHILIP FRENEAU

- (A full bibliography of Freneau has been compiled by Victor Hugo Paltsits. New York, 1903.)
- Father Bumbo's Pilgrimage to Mecca in Arabia. Vol. II. Written by H. B. and P. F. 1770. (This is a manuscript quarto of 55 leaves, in the history of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.)
- The American Village, a Poem. To which are added, Several other Original Pieces in Verse. By Philip Freneau, A.B. New York, 1772. 12mo.
- The first printed poem by Freneau, after his commencement poem, is in an original copy in the Library of Congress; also in John Carter Brown Library, Brown University. From the latter copy a reprint was made, facsimile, Providence, 1906. (Club for Colonial Re- prints), with an introduction by Harry Lyman Koopman, and bibliographical data by Victor Hugo Paltsits.

328 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- A Poem on the Rising Glory of America: Being an Exercise Delivered at the Public Commencement at Nassau-Hall, September 25, 1771. Philadelphia: Aitkin, 1772. 12mo. (Copies of this poem are in the Library of Congress, the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Lenox Library, New York Historical Society, and Massachusetts Historical Society. The manuscript is in Princeton University Library.)
- American Liberty. A Poem. New York, 1775. 12mo.
- The Last Words, Dying Speech and Confession of J—s R—g—n, P—t—r. (Broadside in Lenox Library. Mr. Paltsits says "in the style of Freneau's earlier verse, and perhaps by him" [Bibliography of Freneau].)
- General Gage's Soliloquy. New York: Hugh Gaine, 1775. (Manuscript copy in the Library Company of Philadelphia. For further notes see Bibliography of Freneau by Paltsits, p. 28.)
- A Voyage to Boston. A Poem. By the Author of American Liberty, a Poem. New York: Anderson. 12mo.
- A Voyage to Boston. A Poem. By the Author of American Liberty, a Poem, Gen. Gage's Soliloquy, &c. Philadelphia: Woodhouse, 1775. 12mo. (At American Antiquarian Society, Historical Society of Pennsylvania.)
- General Gage's Confession: Being the Substance of His Excellency's last Conference, With his Ghostly Father, Friar Francis. By the Author of the Voyage to Boston. Printed in the Year, 1775 (Gaine). Small 8vo.
- American Independence, an everlasting Deliverance from British Tyranny: a Poem. Philadelphia, 1778. 12mo. (This poem "By Philip F——, Author of the - American Village, Voyage to Boston, &c," is found in the library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, in The Travels of the Imagination, pp. 113-26.)

- The British Prison-Ship: A Poem, in four Cantos. Philadelphia: Bailey, 1791. 12mo. (Found at Brown University, Library Company of Philadelphia.)
- A Journey from Philadelphia to New York, by Way of Burlington and South-Amboy. By Robert Slender, Stocking Weaver. Philadelphia: Bailey, 1787. 12mo. (This edition is in the library of Brown University, Library of Congress, and New York Historical Society. Another edition, entitled, A Laughable Poem; or Robert Slender's Journey, etc. By Philip Freneau, [Philadelphia: Neversink, 1809. 12mo], is in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Library Company of Philadelphia, and Brown University.)
- The Village Merchant: A Poem. To which is added The Country Printer. Philadelphia, 1794. Small 8vo. (Copies in the Historical Society of Pennsylvania and Brown University.)
- The Poems of Philip Freneau. Written chiefly during the late War. Philadelphia, 1786. Small 8vo.
- The Miscellaneous Works of Mr. Philip Freneau containing his Essays, and additional Poems. Philadelphia, 1788. Small 12mo.
- Poems written between the years 1768 & 1794. By Philip Freneau of New Jersey. A New Edition. Revised and Corrected by the Author. Monmouth (N. J.). Printed at the Press of the Author, at Mount-Pleasant, near Middetown-Point, MDCC,XCV; and, of American Independence, XIX. (Fifteen stars in pyramid.) 8vo.
- Letters on Various interesting and important Subjects, many of which have appeared in the AURORA. By

330 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

Robert Slender, O.S.M. Philadelphia: Hogan. December 30, 1799. 12mo.

Poems written and published during the American Revolutionary War, and now republished from the original Manuscripts; interspersed with Translations from the Ancients, and other Pieces not heretofore in Print. By Philip Freneau. Philadelphia: Lydia Bailey, 1809. 2 vols. 12mo.

A Collection of Poems, on American Affairs, and a variety of other Subjects, chiefly moral and political; written between the Year 1797 and the present Time. By Philip Freneau. New York, 1815. Longworth. 2 vols. Small 12mo.

Poems on various Subjects, but chiefly illustrative of the Events and Actors in the American War of Independence. By Philip Freneau. London: Smith, 1861. Small 8vo. Reprint of 1786 edition.

Poems relating to the American Revolution. By Philip Freneau. New York, 1865. 12mo and royal 8vo. (Memoir and notes by Duyckinck.)

Some Account of the Capture of the Ship Aurora. New York, 1899. 8vo. (Reprinted from manuscript.)

The Poems of Philip Freneau. Edited by Fred L. Pattee. Princeton, N. J., 1902-7. 3 vols.

NEWSPAPERS AND JOURNALS WHICH FRENEAU EDITED OR TO WHICH HE CONTRIBUTED

The Freeman's Journal; or, The North-American Intelligencer. Published by Francis Bailey. Philadelphia. Weekly newspaper. (Freneau's verse and occasional essays from 1781 to 1789. Files in Philadelphia Library Company, Historical Society of Pennsylvania, Lenox Library, Library of Congress, American Antiquarian Society.)

- National Gazette. Edited by Freneau. Philadelphia, October 3, 1791, to October 26, 1793. Semi-weekly.
- Jersey Chronicle. Edited by Freneau. Mount-Pleasant (Monmouth), May 2, 1795, to April 30, 1796. (File at New York Historical Society; scattered numbers at American Antiquarian Society and elsewhere.)
- The Time-Piece; and Literary Companion. Edited by Freneau. New York, March 1797, to March, 1798. Tri-weekly.
- The Pennsylvania Packet and Daily Advertiser. Philadelphia. (Many poems by Freneau from 1782 to 1788.)
- The United States Magazine: A Repository of History, Politics and Literature. Vol. I, for the year 1779. Edited by H. H. Brackenridge. Philadelphia. (Many contributions by Freneau.)
- The American Museum, Vol. I, p. 77 (January, 1787. Under "Original Poetry," attributed to Freneau, is "The Death-Song of the Cherokee Indian.")

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL ON FRENEAU

- A Bibliography of the Separate and Collected Works of Philip Freneau, Together with an Account of His Newspapers. By Victor Hugo Paltsits. New York, 1903.
- Philip Freneau: The Poet of the Revolution. A History of His Life and Times. By Mary S. Austin. Edited by Helen Kearny Vreeland. New York, 1901.
- The Political Activities of Philip Freneau. By Samuel E. Forman, Ph.D. The Johns Hopkins University Studies, in Historical and Political Science. Series XX, Nos. 9, 10. Baltimore, 1902.
- Obituary Notices of Freneau in:
The Monmouth Inquirer, December 19, 1832.

332 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

The New York Evening Post, December 27, 1832.

The New York Spectator, December 31, 1832.

The New York Mirror, January 12, 1833.

Philip Freneau: The Huguenot Patriot-Poet of the Revolution. By Edward F. DeLancey. New York, 1898. Also in Proceedings of the Huguenot Society, Vol. II, No. 2.

The Memorial History of the City of New York. By James Grant Wilson. New York, 1893. 4 vols. (Several references in Vols. II, III, and IV.)

Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Edited by Paul Leicester Ford. (Vol. I, p. 231; Vol. V, pp. 330, 336; Vol. VI, pp. 101-9, 134, 328, 438, 443.)

Jefferson Papers, Series I and II. Manuscript in Library of Congress.

Madison Papers. Library of Congress.

The Character of Thomas Jefferson as Exhibited in His Own Writings. By Theodore Dwight. New York, 1839. (Pp. 129-49.)

The Literary History of Philadelphia. By Ellis Paxson Oberholtzer. Philadelphia, 1906, pp. 115-29.

The Journals of Hugh Gainé, Printer. Edited by Paul Leicester Ford. New York, 1902. (Vol. I, pp. 9, 34, 55, 63, 73, 138.)

Manuscript Letters by and about Philip Freneau. In Pickering Papers, in Massachusetts Historical Society. (Vols. XXIX and LV.)

The Issues of the Press of Pennsylvania, 1685-1785. By Charles R. Hildeburne. Philadelphia, 1885. (Vol. II, p. 148.)

Historic Houses of New Jersey. By W. Jay Mills. Philadelphia, 1902. (Pp. 75, 145, 180, 195.)

History of the College of New Jersey, from Its Origin in 1746 to the Commencement of 1854. By John Mac-

- Lean. Philadelphia, 1877. (Vol. I, chap. 15, pp. 309-22.)
- A History of Journalism in the United States from 1690 to 1872. By Frederic Hudson. New York, 1873. (Pp. 103, 111, 134-36, 175, 185-87.)
- Narrative of a Journey down the Ohio and Mississippi in 1789-1790, by Major Samuel S. Forman. (With a Memoir and Illustrative Notes.) By Lyman C. Draper. Cincinnati, 1888. (Pp. 9-11.)
- The Southern Literary Messenger. (Vol. VIII, No. 1, pp. 2, 3. Note about commencement poem written with Brackenridge.)
- Personal Memoirs and Recollections of Editorial Life. By Joseph T. Buckingham. Boston, 1852. (Vol. II, pp. 137-46.)
- American Poems. Litchfield, 1793. (Scattered poems.)
- The Literary History of the American Revolution. By Moses Coit Tyler. New York, 1897. (Vol. I, pp. 171-83; 413-25; Vol. II, pp. 249-76.)
- Magazine of American History. Vol. XVII, 1887, pp. 120-7.

IV. JOHN TRUMBULL

WRITINGS BY JOHN TRUMBULL

- An Essay on the Use and Advantages of the Fine Arts; Delivered at the Public Commencement in New Haven, Sept. 12, 1770. New Haven, 1770. Pp. 16. 8vo. (Copies of this essay are in the libraries of Yale University, Massachusetts Historical Society, Library of Congress, and Watkinson Library, Hartford.)
- The Progress of Dulness, Part First: or the Rare Adventures of Tom Brainless; Printed in the Year 1772. New Haven. Pp. 19. 8vo. (Second edition, New Haven, 1773. Pp. 20. 8vo.)

334 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

The Progress of Dulness, Part Second: or An Essay on the Life and Character of Dick Hairbrain. New Haven, 1773. Pp. 27. 8vo.

The Progress of Dulness, Part Third; or the The Adventures of Miss Harriet Simple. New Haven, 1773. Pp. 28. 8vo.

The Progress of Dulness: or the Rare Adventures of Tom Brainless. By the celebrated author of McFINGAL. Exeter, 1794. Pp. 72. 16mo. (3 parts.)

M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem. Canto First, or The Town-Meeting. Philadelphia. Printed and Sold by William and Thomas Bradford, at the London Coffee-House, 1775. 16mo.

M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem. Cantos First and Second. The Town-Meeting. Hartford, Philadelphia, and Boston, 1776; London, 1776. 16mo.

M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem, in Four Cantos. Hartford, 1782. Pp. 100. 8vo. (This first edition was printed by Hudson & Goodwin. Two other editions appeared in Hartford the same year; one printed by Nathaniel Patten; the other, by Bavid Webster.)

Later editions of M'Fingal, to be found in the Watkinson Library of Hartford, the Boston Public Library, the Lenox Library, Brown University, Massachusetts Historical Society, and the Library of Congress, are:

M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem, in Four Cantos. Philadelphia, 1791. Pp. 95. 12mo.

M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem. London: (Jordan), 1792. Pp. 142. 8vo.

M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem; Embellished with Nine Copper plates; designed and engraved by E. Tisdale. The first edition with plates and explanatory notes. New York, 1795. Pp. 136. 8vo.

- M'Fingal: With explanatory notes. Boston, 1799. 16mo.
- M'Fingal: A Modern Epic Poem. Baltimore, 1812. Pp. 146. 24mo.
- M'Fingal, etc., Albany, 1813. Hallowell, 1813; Boston, 1826. Philadelphia, 1839.
- M'Fingal: A Modern Poem. With Notes by Benson J. Lossing. New York, 1864. 16mo.
- M'Fingal, etc. New York, 1857, 1860, 1881.
- An Elegy on the Times: First Printed at Boston, Sept. 20th, A.D. 1774. Reprinted New Haven, 1775. Pp. 15. 8vo.
- The Poetical Works of John Trumbull, LL.D., containing M'Fingal, a Modern Epic Poem, revised and corrected, with copious explanatory notes: The Progress of Dulness; and a Collection of Poems on Various Subjects written before and during the Revolutionary War. Hartford, 1820. Printed for Samuel G. Goodrich, by Lincoln & Stone. 2 vols. 8vo.
- Selected poems by Trumbull may be found in:
- American Poems; Selected and Original (1793). Litchfield. (Edited by Dr. Elihu Smith.)
- The Poets of Connecticut. By Rev. Charles W. Everest. Hartford, 1843.
- Specimens of American Poetry. By Samuel Kettell. Boston, 1829. Vols I, II.
- Early essays by Trumbull may be found in:
- Boston Chronicle. September, 1769, to January, 1770. ("The Meddler" and "The Schemer." A large number of these essays were by him.)
- Connecticut Journal, February to July, 1770. ("The Correspondent.")
- Connecticut Courant and Weekly Intelligencer, August 7 and 14, 1775. (Parodies in verse on General Gage's proclamations.)

336 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL ON TRUMBULL

Federalism Triumphant in the Steady Habits of Connecticut Alone, or, the Turnpike Road to a Fortune. A Comic Opera, or Political Farce in Six Acts, as performed at the Theatres Royal and Aristocratic at Hartford and New Haven, October, 1801. Printed in the Year, 1802. (no place.) Trumbull is one of the characters.

Connecticut Journal, September 30, 1770. (Reference to his Essay on the Fine Arts.)

The Origin of M'Fingal. By J. Hammond Trumbull. Historical Magazine, January, 1868.

Memorial History of Hartford County, 1633-1884. By J. Hammond Trumbull, LL.D. Boston, 1886. 2 vols. (Several references.)

The Town and City of Waterbury, Connecticut, from the Aboriginal Period to the Year Eighteen Hundred and Ninety-Five. Edited by Joseph Anderson, D.D. New Haven, 1896. (Vol. I, pp. 326-29; Vol. II, pp. 9, 546; Vol. III, pp. 923-26.)

Brinton Eliot; From Yale to Yorktown. By James Eugene Farmer. New York, 1902. (Chap. 7.)

The Literary History of the American Revolution. By Tyler. New York, 1897. (Vol. I, pp. 188-221, 427-50.)

List of Books Printed in Connecticut from 1709 to 1800. By James Hammond Trumbull, LL.D., L.H.D. 1904. (Acorn Club.)

Letters among Oliver Wolcott, Jr., Papers, at Connecticut Historical Society.

Biographical Sketches of the Graduates of Yale College, with Annals of the College History. By Franklin B. Dexter. New York. Third Series, 1903, pp. 251-7, etc.

V. THE "HARTFORD WITS"

WRITINGS BY AND ABOUT THE "HARTFORD WITS"

- The New Haven Gazette and the Connecticut Magazine, October 19, 1786, to February 5, 1787. ("The American Antiquities," later collected as "The Anarchiad.")
- The Anarchiad. A New England Poem. Written in concert by David Humphreys, Joel Barlow, John Trumbull, and Dr. Lemuel Hopkins. Now first published in book form. Edited, with notes and appendices, by Luther G. Riggs, New Haven, 1861. Pp. 120. 24mo.
- The American Mercury, Printed by Elisha Babcock. Hartford. August 8, 1791, to March 12, 1792. (Numbers of "The Echo.")
- The Echo with Other Poems. Printed at the Porcupine Press by Pasquin Petronius. New York, 1807. 8vo. (The printer was Isaac Riley.)
- The Political Green-House for the Year 1798. Addressed to the Readers of the Connecticut Courant, January 1st, 1799. Hartford, no date. (Written by Theodore Dwight, Richard Alsop, and Lemuel Hopkins. Small 8vo. Included in "Echo," pp. 233-59.)
- Guillotina for 1797. Addressed to the Readers of the Connecticut Courant. Hartford, January 1, 1797. (A broadside, unidentified, in Connecticut Historical Society.)
- The Democratiad. A Poem in Retaliation, for the Philadelphia Jockey Club. By a Gentleman of Connecticut. Philadelphia, 1795. Pp. 22. 8vo. (In "The Echo," pp. 127-40; supposed to be by Dr. Hopkins.)
- The Guillotina, or a Democratic Dirge: A Poem. By the Author of Democratiad. Philadelphia. Pp. 14. 8vo. (Probably by Hopkins.)

338 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- The last two pamphlets may be found at the Connecticut Historical Society, Lenox Library, and Library of Congress.
- Aristocracy; an Epic Poem by De Bellare Superbos. Bk. I. Philadelphia, 1795. (At Library of Congress catalogued as Richard Alsop's [?].)
- The Poets of Connecticut. By Rev. Charles W. Everest. Hartford, 1843. 8vo.
- A Sketch of the History of Yale College. By William L. Kingsley. Boston, 1835. (Vol. I.)
- List of Books Printed in Connecticut from 1709 to 1800. By James Hammond Trumbull, LL.D., L.H.D., 1904. (Acorn Club.)
- American Poems; Selected and Original. Litchfield, 1793.
- Atlantic Monthly, Vol. XX, 1865, pp. 187-201. The New Englander, January, 1882.

WRITINGS BY AND ABOUT JOEL BARLOW

- The Prospect of Peace, a Poetical Composition delivered in Yale College, at the Public Examination, July 23, 1778. New Haven, 1788. Pp. 12. 8vo.
- The Vision of Columbus; a Poem in Nine Books. Hartford, 1787. Pp. 258. 8vo. (2d ed. Hartford, 1787; 12mo.)
- Conspiracy of Kings. London, 1792; Paris, 1793. Pp. 32. 4to.
- Advice to the Privileged Orders in Several States of Europe. Part I. Pp. 156. 8vo. London (2d ed.), 1792-93.
- Hasty Pudding; a Poem. In three cantos. Written at Chambéry, in Savoy, January 1, 1793. New Haven, 1796; Salem, 1799; Albany, 1807; Boston, 1810. Pp. 16. 8vo.

- Joel Barlow to his Fellow Citizens of the United States of America. Paris, 1799. Pp. 27. 8vo.
- The Political Writings of Joel Barlow: A new edition. New York, 1796. Pp. 258. 16mo.
- The Columbiad. A Poem by Joel Barlow. Philadelphia, 1807; Philadelphia, 1809; London, 1809; Paris, 1813; Washington, 1825. Pp. 454. 8vo.
- Critical Observations on the Poem of Joel Barlow, The Columbiad. By M. Gregoire. Reply by Joel Barlow. Washington City, 1809. (This last, as well as other writings mentioned, is in the Library of Congress.)
- Life and Letters of Joel Barlow; Poet, Statesman, Philosopher. By Charles B. Todd. New York, 1886.
- Three Men of Letters. By Moses Coit Tyler. New York, 1895.
- Manuscript letters to Oliver Wolcott, Jr., in folio at Connecticut Historical Society.
- Manuscript letters to wife and friends; also an unfinished poem, "The Canal;" at Pequot Library, Southport, Conn.
- Memorial History of Hartford County. By J. Hammond Trumbull. New Haven, 1886. (Several references to Barlow and the other "wits.")

WRITINGS OF DAVID HUMPHREYS

- The Miscellaneous Works of David Humphreys, Late Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States of America to the Court of Madrid. New York, 1804. 8vo.
- Miscellaneous Works, etc., (containing Poems and Life of Israel Putnam). New York, 1790. (In this volume is the play, "The Widow of Malabar," which was not included in the Miscellaneous Works, 1804.)

340 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- A Poem addressed to the Armies of the United States of America. By a Gentleman of the Army. New Haven, 1780. Pp. 16. 8vo. Reprinted, New Haven, 1785; Paris, 1786 as—Discours en vers, adressé aux officiers et aux soldats des différentes armées américaines. Paris, 1786.
- A Poem on the Happiness of America; addressed to the Citizens of the United States by David Humphreys, LL.D. London, 1786; Hartford, 1786. Pp. 51. 4to.
- An Essay on the Life of the Honourable Major-General Israel Putnam; addressed to the State Society of the Cincinnati in Connecticut. Hartford, 1788; Middletown, 1794; Philadelphia, 1798; Boston, 1818. 12mo.
- Life and Exploits of Israel Putnam. New York, 1834. 24mo.
- Memoirs of the life, adventures & military exploits of Israel Putnam, Senior Major-general in the Revolutionary army of the United States, and next in rank to Gen. Washington (by David Humphreys). New York: Duyckinck, 1815. Pp. 108. 24mo.
- A Poem on Industry; addressed to the Citizens of the United States of America. By Col. David Humphreys, Minister Resident at the Court of Lisbon. Philadelphia, 1794. 8vo.
- Valedictory Discourse delivered before the Cincinnati of Connecticut, in Hartford, July 4, 1804, at the Dissolution of the Society. By Col. David Humphreys.
- Letters from the Hon. David Humphreys, F.R.S. to the Rt. Hon. Sir Joseph Banks, President of the Royal Society, London, containing some ACCOUNT of the SERPENT of the OCEAN, frequently seen in Gloucester Bay. New York, 1817.

The Yankey in England, a Drama, in Five Acts. By General Humphreys. (No date, nor place, but the preface signed D. Humphreys, Humphreysville, Sept. 1, 1815.) A copy is in Boston Athenaeum.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL ON DAVID HUMPHREYS

Yale and Her Honor-Roll in the American Revolution, 1775-1783. By Henry P. Johnston. New York, 1888.

Seymour; Past and Present. By Rev. Hollis A. Campbell, William C. Sharpe, and Frank G. Basset, Seymour, 1902.

Chapter Sketches, Connecticut D. A. R. Edited by Mary Philotheta Root. New Haven. (1900.)

The Writings of Thomas Jefferson. Edited by Paul L. Ford. (Vol. I, pp. 216, 233; Vol. IX, p. 225, 226.)

The Writings of Washington. Collected and edited by Worthington C. Ford, New York, 1891. (Vol. X, pp. 473, 474.)

The Veil Removed; or, Reflections on Humphrey's Essay on the Life of Putnam. By John Fellows. New York, 1843.

Manuscript letters in Pickering Papers. Vol. XXI. (Massachusetts Historical Society.)

WRITINGS BY AND ABOUT THEODORE DWIGHT

An Oration before the Connecticut Society for the Promotion of Freedom convened at Hartford, May 8, 1794. Hartford, 1794. Pp. 24. 8vo.

An Oration spoken at Hartford, July 4th, 1798. Hartford, 1798. Pp. 31. 8vo.

The Triumph of Democracy; a Poem. January 1, 1801. (No name nor place; in "The Echo," pp. 267-82.)

History of the Hartford Convention with a Review of the Policy of the United States Government which led to the War of 1812. New York, 1833. 8vo.

342 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- The Character of Thomas Jefferson as Exhibited in his Own Writings. Boston, 1839. 12mo.
- Memorial History of Hartford County. By J. Hammond Trumbull, LL.D. Boston, 1886. (Vol. I, pp. 124, 157, 160, 385, 516, 612.)

WRITINGS BY AND ABOUT RICHARD ALSOP

- To the Freemen of the State of Connecticut. (Anon., no place; 1803. In copy at Massachusetts Historical Society, a note is written in ink, "By Richard Alsop; Middletown, Sept. 12, 1803.")
- The Charms of Fancy. A Poem in Four Cantos. Edited from the original manuscript by Theodore Dwight. New York, 1856. Pp. 214. 8vo.
- A Poem Sacred to the Memory of George Washington, Late President of the United States and Commander-in-Chief of the Armies of the United States, by Richard Alsop. Hartford, 1800. Pp. 23. 8vo.
- Verses to a Shearwater, in Specimens of American Poetry. By Samuel Kettell. (Vol. II, p. 60.)
- Runic translation; Twilight of the Gods, in American Poems; Selected and Original (1793). Pp. 265-272.
- Translations:
- The Enchanted Lake of the Fairy Morgana. From the Orlando Inamorata of Francisco Berni. New York, 1806. 8vo.
- An Appendix to the Civil and Political History of Chili; translated from Juan Ignacio Molina. New York, 1808. 8vo.
- Selections in The Poets of Connecticut. By Rev. Charles W. Everest. 1843. (Pp. 73-91.)
- Manuscript letter to Dr. Mason Cogswell about The Echo, at Connecticut Historical Society, in John Trumbull's copy of The Echo.

Possibly the author of Aristocracy, an Epic Poem by De Bellare Superbos. Philadelphia, 1795.

WRITINGS BY AND ABOUT LEMUEL HOPKINS

- The Democratiad. A Poem in Retaliation, for the Philadelphia Jockey Club.* By a Gentleman of Connecticut. Philadelphia, 1795. Pp. 22. 8vo. (Reprinted in The Echo.)
- The Guillotina, or a Democratic Dirge. A Poem.* By the Author of Democratiad. Philadelphia. Pp. 14. (Reprinted in The Echo.)
- New Year's Verses, For the Connecticut Courant, January 1, 1795.* Hartford, 1795. (Reprinted in The Echo.)
- Specimens of American Poetry.* By Samuel Kettell. (Vol. I, pp. 272-83.)
- The Poets of Connecticut.* By Charles W. Everest. 1843. (Pp. 51-58.)
- American Medical Biography; or, Memoirs of Eminent Physicians.* By James Thacher, M.D. Boston, 1828. (Vol. I, pp. 298-306.)
- Manuscript letters to Oliver Wolcott, Jr., at Connecticut Historical Society.
- The Town and City of Waterbury, Connecticut, from the Aboriginal Period to the Year Eighteen Hundred and Ninety-Five.* Edited by Joseph Anderson, D.D. New Haven, 1896. 3 vols. (Many references to Hopkins.)
- Memorial History of Hartford County.* By J. Hammond Trumbull, LL.D. Boston, 1886. Vol. I, pp. 139-58.

VI. JOSEPH DENNIE

WRITINGS BY DENNIE

- The Lay Preacher; or Short Sermons for Idle Readers.* Walpole (N. H.), 1796. Pp. 132. 16mo.

344 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

The Spirit of the Farmer's Museum and Lay Preacher's Gazette. Walpole. Carlyle, printer for Thomas & Thomas. 1801. Pp. 318. 12mo.

The Lay Preacher, collected and arranged by John E. Hall, Esq. Counsellor at Law. Published at Philadelphia by Harrison Hall, at the Portfolio Office, 1817. Pp. 168. 16mo.

New and Original Essays by Joseph Dennie. Philadelphia, 1818. (Only one in the series appeared, so far as known.)

The New Hampshire Journal; or The Farmer's Weekly Museum. Walpole, 1793-97. (Contributions by Dennie during these years. Some later issues were entitled The Farmer's Museum: New Hampshire & Vermont Journal, 1797-1810.)

The Tablet: A Miscellaneous Paper devoted to the Belles-Lettres. (Edited by Dennie.) Boston. 4to. May 19, 1795, to August 11, 1795. (No more issued.)

The Port Folio by Oliver Oldschool. Philadelphia. 1801-12. (Started and edited by Dennie.) Weekly, 1801-8; monthly 1809-12. (The journal continued in various forms until 1827; published by Maxwell; 4to of 8 pages as weekly.)

Two letters from Dennie to Hon. Jeremiah Mason. Massachusetts Historical Society Proceedings, March, 1880, Vol. XVII, pp. 362-65.)

Letters by Dennie to Timothy Pickering, in Pickering Papers (Massachusetts Historical Society, Vol. X, XIII, XXIV.)

Letters and manuscript, in Adams Papers, from Dennie to John Quincy Adams. (In the possession of Charles Francis Adams.)

CRITICAL AND BIOGRAPHICAL ON DENNIE

- Sketch of Dennie. [By Colonel W. W. Clapp.] Cambridge, 1880. 8vo.
- The Philadelphia Souvenir: A Collection of Fugitive Pieces from The Philadelphia Press, with Biographical and Explanatory Notes by J. E. Hall. Philadelphia, 1826. (Pp. 70-136.)
- Walpole as It Was and as It Is, containing the Complete Civil History of the Town from 1749 to 1879. By George Aldrich. Claremont, N. H., 1880. (Pp. 74-82.)
- History of Philadelphia. By Scharf and Westcott. Philadelphia, 1884. (Vol. I, pp. 508, 509; Vol. III, p. 1979.)
- The Literary History of Philadelphia. By Ellis Paxson Oberholtzer. Philadelphia, 1906. (Pp. 168-83, 189, 264.)
- Memoirs, Journal and Correspondence of Thomas Moore. Edited by Lord John Russell. London, 1856. (Various passing references in Vols. I, II, III, IV, V, VI, VII, VIII.)
- Poetical Works of Thomas Moore. Leipzig, 1842. (Collected and annotated by himself. Vol. I, references in Preface and notes.)
- Life of Josiah Quincy by His Son, Edmund Quincy. Boston, 1867. (Pp. 30-33.)
- Memoirs of John Quincy Adams. Edited by Charles Francis Adams. Philadelphia, 1877. (Vol. I, p. 240; Vol. IX, p. 239.)
- Personal Memoirs, Anecdotes and Reminiscences. By J. T. Buckingham. Boston, 1850, 1852. Vol. II, pp. 175-90, 195-202, 226.) Some editions have title, Specimens of Newspaper Literature, with Memoirs, etc.
- A History of Journalism in the United States from 1690 to 1872. By Frederic Hudson. New York, 1873. (Vol. II, pp. 51-64, 708-18.)

346 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- The New Englander Galaxy, July 24, 1818. (Anecdote of Dennie's law-experience as given by Royall Tyler.)
- Benjamin's Collector, February, 1896; article by Charles Henry Hart. (Two letters from Moore to J. E. Hall, with many references to Dennie.)
- The Critic, June, 1888. (Two Letters from Moore to Dennie.)
- New England Magazine, August, 1896. ("Damon and Pythias among our Early Journalists.")
- Curiosities of Literature. By D'Israeli and Griswold. New York, 1848. (Pp. 51, 52.)
- Magazine of American History, Vol. XVII, 1887. Pp. 117, 118.
- The Historical Magazine, December, 1857, p. 379. Rufus Griswold's reference to Dennie's portrait.
- American Historical and Literary Curiosities. Collected and edited by J. Jay Smith and John F. Watson. New York, 1850. Plate XLI. (Letter and song sent by Moore to Dennie.)

VII. WILLIAM DUNLAP

WRITINGS BY DUNLAP

Complete lists of Dunlap's plays may be found in:

Second edition of Early American Plays by Oscar Wegelin, with Introduction by John Malone. New York, 1905. The first edition, 1900, has only a partial list.

Introduction to The Father, or American Shandyism, reprinted by the Dunlap Society. New York, 1887. (Pp. x, xi.)

The following are some of Dunlap's most representative plays, to be found generally at libraries with a collection of Americana:

- The Father, or American Shandyism. A Comedy in five acts. Written by a Citizen of New York. New York, 1789. 8vo. Reprint of the above by the Dunlap Society, New York, 1887. Introduction by Thomas J. McKee. The same play was printed later as The Father of an Only Child, by William Dunlap. New York, 1807. 12mo.
- Darby's Return: a Comic Sketch. New York, 1789.
- Darby's Return, an Interlude. New York, 1806. 8vo.
- The Archers, or Mountaineers of Switzerland, an Opera, in Three Acts, by an American. New York, 1796. 8vo.
- Tell Truth and Shame the Devil; a comedy in 2 acts, as performed by the old American Company, New York, 1797.
- André: A Tragedy in Five Acts. New York, 1798. Reprint of this edition by the Dunlap Society, New York, 1887; Introduction by J. Brander Matthews.)
- André: A Tragedy in Five Acts; To which are added Authentic Documents respecting Major André, Consisting of letters to Miss Seward, The Cow Chase; a Satirical poem by Major John André; with the proceedings of court martial. New York: Swords, 1798. London, 1799.
- False Shame, or The American Orphan in Germany. A Comedy in Four acts, translated from the German of Kotzebue. New York, 1800; Charleston, 1800. 12mo.
- Abaellino; the Great Bandit. Translated from the German of Tschokke and adapted to the New York Theatre. New York, 1802; Boston and New York, 1803. 12mo.
- Ribbemont, or the Feudal Baron. A Tragedy in Five Acts. New York, 1803. 18mo.

348 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- The Glory of Columbia; her Yoemanry. A Play in Five Acts. The Songs, Duets, and Choruses, intended for the celebration of the Fourth of July at the New York Theatre. New York, 1803, 1817. 12mo.
- The Voice of Nature; A Drama in 3 Acts from French Melodrama, Le Jugement de Salomon. New York, 1803. 18mo.
- Blue Beard; or Female Curiosity; a dramatic romance in three acts, as altered for the New York Theatre, with additional songs, by William Dunlap. New York, 1803, 1806. 18mo.
- Lord Leicester; a Tragedy. New York, 1807. 16mo.
- Fontaineville Abbey. A Tragedy. New York, 1807. 18mo.
- The Blind Boy; a Melodrama as performed at the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden. London, 1808; New York, 1808. 12mo. (Altered from Kotzebue's Epigram.)
- Rinaldo Rinaldini, or the Great Banditti, New York, 1810.
- The Africans or War, Love and Duty. Philadelphia, 1811; Hartford, 1814.
- Yankee Chronology: a musical interlude in one Act to which is added Patriotic Songs of the Freedom of the Seas & Yankee Tars. New York, 1812. 16mo.
- Yankee Chronology or Huzza for the American Navy. (Broadside, 1813-14.) In American Antiquarian Society.
- The Italian Father; a comedy in Five Acts. New York, 1810.
- Lover's Vows, a play in five acts. New York, 1814. 12mo. (From the German of Kotzebue.)
- A Trip to Niagara, or Travellers in America. A Farce in Three Acts written for the Bowery Theatre, N. Y. By William Dunlap, Historical and Portrait Painter;

- author of Memoirs of G. F. Cooke, C. B. Brown, Father of an Only Child, etc. New York, 1830. 18mo.
- Ella: a Norwegian Tale*, in American Poems, Litchfield, (1793), pp. 226-31.
- Memoirs of George Fred Cooke, Esq., Late of the Theatre Royal, Covent Garden*, by William Dunlap, Esq. London, 1813. 2 vols.
- The Life of Charles Brockden Brown, together with Selections from the Rarest of his Printed Works, from His Original Letters, and from his Manuscripts Before Unpublished.* By William Dunlap. In two volumes. Philadelphia, 1815.
- Thirty Years Ago; or, Memoirs of a Water Drinker.* New York, 1836. 2 vols.
- A History of the American Theatre* by William Dunlap, Vice-President of the National Academy of Design, Author of Memoirs of George Fred Cooke, C. B. Brown, etc. New York, 1832.
- History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States; by William Dunlap.* New York, 1834. 2 vols.
- A History of New York for Schools*, by William Dunlap. In two volumes. New York, 1837. 16mo.
- History of the New Netherlands, Province of New York and State of New York, to Adoption of the Federal Constitution; by William Dunlap.* In two volumes. New York, 1839.
- Four volumes of manuscript journals, in New York Historical Society: 15, 16, 24, 30.

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL ON DUNLAP

The best biographical material is found in many references to himself in his History of the American Theatre, and also in History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design in the United States; also in the manuscript journals at the New York Historical Society.

350 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

Early American Plays (1714-1830). By Oscar Wegelin. Introduction by John Malone. Dunlap Society Publication. New York, 1900; 2d ed., 1905.

New England Magazine, February, 1894: Beginnings of American Dramatic Literature. By Paul Leicester Ford.

Occasional Addresses. Edited by Laurence Hutton and William Carey. Published by the Dunlap Society. New York, 1890. (Pp. 51-53.)

Washington and the Theatre. By Paul Leicester Ford. Published by the Dunlap Society. New York, 1899.

History of New York City. By Martha J. Lamb. New York, 1850. (Vol. II, pp. 352, 353.)

Old New York. By John W. Francis. New York, 1866. Pp. 66-68, and scattered notes.)

References in The Memorial History of the City of New York. By James Grant Wilson. New York, 1893. (Vols. II, III, IV.)

Contributions to the Early History of Perth Amboy. By W. A. Whitehead. New York, 1856. (Pp. 97, 126-28, 139-43, 243, 292-94, 328, 329, 343.)

Descriptive Pamphlet of Christ Rejected by the High Priests, Elders and People. Shields, Ashburn & Co., Norfolk. (No date.)

History of New York City. By William L. Stone. New York, 1872. (Pp. 134, 151, 241-48.)

History of the American Theatre during the Revolution and After. By George O. Seilhamer. Philadelphia, 1889. (Vol. I, pp. 3, 19, 72, 73, 81, 141-43; Vol. II, 274-80.)

VIII. CHARLES BROCKDEN BROWN

WRITINGS BY BROWN

- History of American Painting. By Samuel Isham. New York, 1905. Pp. 11, 17-24, 43-49, 72-79, 186-89.
- The Columbian Magazine. Philadelphia, April, 1789. (Contains Brown's "The Rhapsodist.")
- The Weekly Magazine of Original Essays, Fugitive Pieces and Interesting Intelligence. Philadelphia. Vol. I, 1798-99. (Contains Brown's "The Man at Home" and "The Rights of Women.") The latter was printed as Alcuin: a Dialogue. New York: Swords, 1798. 16mo.
- Wieland or the Transformation: An American Tale. New York, 1798. 12mo.
- Ormond, or the Secret Witness. New York, 1798.
- Arthur Mervyn or the Memoirs of the Year 1793. Philadelphia, 1799. 12mo.
- Edgar Huntley or the Memoirs of a Sleepwalker. Philadelphia, 1799-1800. 2 vols. 12mo.
- Clara Howard or the Enthusiasm of Love. Philadelphia, 1801.
- Jane Talbot. London, New York, and Philadelphia, 1801.
- The Novels of Brown were reprinted by Goodrich, Boston, 1827, in uniform edition, 7 vols. in 6. 12mo.
- Complete edition of the Novels of Charles Brockden Brown. Edited and published by David McKay. Philadelphia, 1887.
- Carwin, the Biloquist, and other American Tales & Pieces by Charles Brockden Brown, Author of Wieland, Ormond, Arthur Mervyn, &c. In Three Volumes. London, 1822. 12mo.

352 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

An Address to the Government on the Utility and Justice of Restrictions upon foreign Commerce. (Anon.) Philadelphia, 1809. 8vo.

An Address to the Government of the United States on the Cession of Louisiana to the French and on the Late Breach of Treaty by the Spaniards, including the Translation of a Memorial, on the War of St. Domingo, and Cession of the Mississippi to France. Drawn up by a French Counsellor of State. A new edition, revised, corrected, and improved. (Anon.) Philadelphia, 1803.

A View of the Soil and Climate of the United States of America with supplementary Remarks upon Florida, etc., by C. F. Volney. Translated, with occasional remarks, by C. B. Brown. Philadelphia, 1804.

Editor of and Contributor to:

The Monthly Magazine and American Review, Vols. I-III, April, 1799, to December, 1800. New York: Swords.

The American Review and Literary Journal for the Year, 1801. New York: Swords.

The Literary Magazine and American Register, Vols. I-VIII. Philadelphia: Conrad, 1803-7.

The American Register or General Repository of History, Politics, and Science. Philadelphia, 1806-10.

Manuscript letters in Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

Manuscript letter to Jefferson, and reply, in Jefferson papers (Library of Congress).

BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL ON BROWN

Life of Charles Brockden Brown. By William Dunlap. 2 vols. New York, 1815. (Together with Selections from the Rarest of his Printed Works, from his Original Letters, and from his Manuscripts Before Unpublished.)

A Library of American Biography. Edited by Jared Sparks. New York, 1834. (Vol. I, sketch of Brown by W. H. Prescott.)

Charles Brockden Brown: A Study of Early American Fiction. By Martin S. Vilas. Burlington, Vt., 1904.

The National Portrait Gallery of Distinguished Americans. Conducted by James B. Longacre and James Herring. New York, 1835. (Vol. III, from miniature by Dunlap, engraved by Forrest.)

The Memorial History of the City of New York. By James Grant Wilson. New York, 1893. (Many references in Vols. III and IV.)

A History of Philadelphia. By Scharf & Westcott, Philadelphia, 1884. (Vol. III, p. 1981.)

The Literary History of Philadelphia. By Ellis Paxson Oberholtzer. Philadelphia, 1906. (Many references.)

The Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography. Philadelphia, 1906. Vol. 30, p. 242.

North American Review, June, 1819. (Vol. IX, p. 58-64.)

Blackwood's Magazine, February, 1820. (Vol. VII, p. 554.)

Blackwood's Edinburgh Review, October, 1824. Vol. XVI, p. 421-26. (Signed "X. Y. Z.")

Fortnightly Review, September, 1878, Vol. 30, pp. 399, 400.

INDEX

INDEX

A

- "A. B.," 38
"A Bone to Gnaw for the Democrats," 173
"A Child Returning from School," painting, 270, 272
A Group of Hartford Wits, 149-89
A History of American Literature, 298, 322
A History of New York, for Schools, 274, 349
"A Laughable Poem," 91, 92, 329
A Library of American Literature, 62, 321
"A Lover of Candour," 38
"A Poem Addressed to the Armies," 177, 340
"A Poem on Industry," 178, 340
"A Poem on the Happiness of America," 181, 340
"A Poem on the Restoration of Chaos and Night," 152, 154
"A Poem on the Rising Glory," 66, 67, 328
"A Poem Sacred to the Memory of George Washington," 185, 342
"A Political Catechism," 41
"A Pretty Story," 28, 129, 324
"A Prophecy," 28, 30, 31, 129, 324
"A Speech of a Standing Member," 53
"A Sketch of the History of Yale College," 112, 338
"A Trip to Niagara," 260, 348
"A View of the Soil," etc., 309, 352
"A Voyage to Boston," 69, 70, 328
Abaellino, 347
Adams, Charles Francis, 219, 231, 344, 345
Adams, John, references to, 51, 83, 125, 127, 130, 138, 139, 163, 203, 208, 220; Letters to His Wife, 21, 51, 327
Adams, John Quincy, references to, 218, 220, 231, 344, 345;
Memoirs of, 219, 231, 345
Adams, Samuel, 9
Addison, Joseph, 19, 111, 114
"Advertisement of a Coquette," 117, 119

358 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- "Advice to the Ladies not to Neglect the Dentist," 94
 "Advice to the Privileged Orders," 338
 "Advice to Young Authors," 91
 Aitkin, R., 28, 324
Alcuin, 292, 351
 Aldrich, George I., 203, 204, 345
 Allen Paul, 226
 "Almanack-Maker, The," 76
 Alsop, Fanny, 183
 Alsop, Richard, 13, 150, 161, 162, 167, 169, 182, 342, 343
 "American Addison," 194, 206
 American Antiquarian Society, The, vi, 41, 89, 324, 330
American Antiquities, The, 155, 158, 188, 337
 American Company of Actors, The, 238, 247
 American Fiction in Development, 279, 280, 281
American Historical and Literary Curiosities, 346
 American History, early periods, v, 3, 8, 9
 "American Independence," a poem, 328
American Lands and Letters, 136, 322
 "American Liberty," a poem, 328
 American Literature from 1765 to 1815, 4, 9, 14, 15
American Museum, The, 53, 54, 56, 95, 321, 325, 326
 American Philosophical Society, 8, 20, 24, 25, 32, 36, 325
American Poems (1793), 137, 166, 187, 321, 333, 338
 "American Turtles," 39
 Ames, Fisher, 13
 "An Address to the Government," etc., 309, 351
 "An Elegy on the Times," 126, 127, 335
 "An Elegy Sacred to the Memory of Mrs. Ann Graeme," 22, 323
 "An Essay on the Life of Gen. Israel Putnam," 340
 "An Essay on the Use and Advantages of the Fine Arts," 112-114, 333
 "An Exercise Containing a Dialogue," etc., 22, 323
 "An Oration before the Connecticut Society," 341
 "An Oration Spoken at Hartford," 341
 "An Oration Which Might Have Been Delivered," 52, 324 Anacreon, 223, 225
 Anarch, 152, 156, 157

- Anderson, Rev. Joseph, 108, 336, 343
 André, Major John, 236, 258
André, play, 235, 254-58, 262, 347
Androborus, 236
 Anti-Federalists, 45, 46, 78, 81
 "Aquiline Nimblechops," 167
Appeal to the World, 9
 "Apostrophe to Fancy," 99
 Arbuthnot's History of John Bull, 30
 "Aristocracy," an epic poem, 338, 343
Arthur Mervyn, 291, 292, 297-300, 351
Atlantic Monthly, The, 338
Aurora, The, 98, 164
 Austin, Mary S., 73, 87, 331

B

- Babcock, Elisha, 337
 Bache, Benjamin Franklin, 98, 164, 165
 Bailey, Francis, 76, 89
 "Ballads of Taxes and Tea," 11
 Banks, Sir Joseph, 340
 "Barabbas and the Thieves," painting, 271
 Barlow, Joel, 143, 150, 152, 157, 161, 162, 169, 170-73, 181, 203, 338, 339
 Barrell, Joseph, 207
 Bartow, Thomas, 242, 243
 "Basket Song," 251, 252
 Basset, Frank G., 341
 "Battle of the Kegs," 39, 40, 41, 95, 324
 "Beauties of Santa Cruz," 72
 Beers, Henry A., 296
 Berkeley, Governor William, 236
 Berni, Francisco, 342
 Bibliography of the Works of Philip Freneau, 129, 327
Bibliography of Vermont, 239
 Bidwell, Barnabas, 238
Biennial Reports of the Dunlap Society, 235
Biglow Papers, The, 136

360 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- Biographical Sketches of the Graduates of Yale College*, 336
Biography of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, 326
 Bird, Dr. Seth, 185
 Bishop of Worcester, 23, 26
 Blackwood's Edinburgh Review, 316, 317, 353
 Bleecker, Anthony, 271
Blue Beard, 260, 348
 Bonaparte, Joseph, 57
 Borden, Ann, 27
 Borden, Joseph, 27
 Borden, Madam, 27
 Bordentown, New Jersey, 27, 55, 57
 Boston, 10, 63, 69, 118, 124, 125, 126, 128, 130, 132, 133, 137,
 149, 194, 195, 197, 198, 200, 214, 236, 252
 Boston Chronicle, 115, 116, 117, 335
 Boston Gazette, 11, 322
 Boston News Letter, 195
 Boston Port Bill, 126
Bracebridge Hall, 102
 Brackenridge, Hugh Henry, 12, 65, 66, 67, 68, 72, 163, 237, 281, 282
 Bradstreet, Anne, 5
 Brattleboro, Vt., 201
Brinton Eliot; from Yale to Yorktown, 119, 336
 "Brook of the Valley, The," 101, 102
 Brown, Charles Brockden, 193, 218, 267, 282-318, 351, 352, 353; environment and influences upon his fiction, 282-86;
 life in New York, 288-91; as novelist in New York and Philadelphia, 291-305; as journalist and essayist, 306-10; illness and death, 314, 315; personality and influence, 316-18
 Brown, William Linn, 314
 Brown University Library, 69, 91, 132, 327, 329, 334
 Bryant, William C., 14, 15, 102, 184
 Buckingham, J. T., 201, 202, 205, 333, 345
 Burgoyne, General John, 37, 38, 137, 236
 Burr, Aaron, 65, 168
 Burrow, James, 23, 24, 25
 Bushnell, David, 39
 Bulter's Hudibras, 134, 136

C

- Cadwallader, General Thomas, 218
 "Calamus," 38, 52, 325
Caleb Williams, 282, 283, 297
 "Calumniator," 38
 "Calvary," painting, 272
 "Camp Ballad," 38
 Campbell, Hollis A., 341
 Canary Islands, 93
 "Captain Freneau," 76, 94
 Carey, William, 272, 349
 Carlisle, David, Jr., 200, 344
Carwin, the Biloquist, 295, 316, 351
 "Causes of American Discontents," 10
 "Cautious," 38, 325
Chapter Sketches, D. A. R., 174, 341
Charles Brockden Brown: A Study, 353
 Charlestown, N. H., 196, 197, 200
Charlotte Temple, 281
 "Charms of Fancy, The," 169, 182, 183, 184
 Chauncy, Charles, 10
 "Chester," hymn, 12
 Chew, Benjamin, 21
 Childs and Swaine, 77, 80
 "Christ Bearing the Cross," painting, 269
 "Christ Rejected," painting, 268, 269
 Chusetown, Conn., 178
 Cibber, Colley, 263
 Clapp, Colonel W. W., 198, 216, 345
Clara Howard, 303, 351
 "Climenole," 218
 Clinton, Governor George, 48, 100, 271
 Clinton, Sir Henry, 73
 Club for Colonial Reprints, 69, 327
 Cobbett, William, 164, 173
 Cogswell, Dr. Mason, 150, 161, 182, 186, 342
 Cole, Thomas, 272
 Coleridge, Samuel T., 72

362 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- College of Philadelphia, 20, 21, 22, 23, 149
"Columbia," an ode, 12
Common Sense, 129
Congreve, William, 19
Connecticut Courant, 128, 129, 165, 167, 335
Connecticut Gazette, 110
Connecticut Historical Society, vi, 142, 143, 151, 161, 165, 182, 187, 336, 337, 339, 342
Connecticut Mirror, 182
"Conquest of Canaan," 173, 180
"Conspiracy of Kings," 170, 338
Continental Congress, 21, 27, 28, 125
Continental Loan Office, 31
Contributions to Early History of Perth Amboy, 243, 350
Cooke, George Fred, 267
Cooper, J. Fenimore, 14, 15, 261, 301, 302, 318
Cooper, T. Athorp, 267
Copley, John Singleton, 57, 272
Cornelia, 236
Cornwallis, Lord, 73
Cowper, William, 104, 215
Crafts Tavern, 202
"Crispin O'Connor," 94
Critical Observations on the Columbiad, 172, 339
"Cupid Sleeping," painting, 271
Curiosities of Literature, 205, 346
Cushing, Thomas, 127
Cyclopaedia of American Literature, 75, 321

D

- Darby's Return*, 248, 347
Darley, Mrs., 266, 271
D'Auberteul, 160
Davis, M. L., 90
Deane, Silas, 128
"Death on the Pale Horse," painting, 270
De Bellare Superbos, 338
Decatur, Captain Stephen, 98

- Declaration of Independence, 12, 19, 27, 216
- Defoe, Daniel, 299
- Delancey, Edward F., 332
- Delaplaine's Repository of Distinguished Americans, 51, 326
- Democracy*, pamphlet, 167
- Democratiad, The*, 164, 165
- Dennie, Joseph, 193-231, 343, 344, 345; early life and college, 194-96; as lawyer and lay reader, 196-99; as editor of Farmer's Museum, 200-02; The Portfolio, 219-27; Lay Sermons, 228-39
- Derby, Conn., 174, 175
- Descriptive Pamphlet of Christ Rejected*, 350
- "Design of the Preacher," 197
- "Destruction of Babylon," 125
- Detroit, Mich., 143
- Dexter, Franklin B., 336
- Dialogues of the Dead*, 52
- "Dick Hairbrain," 122, 124, 334
- Dickens, Ashbury, 214
- Dickinson, John, 10, 11, 48, 322
- Discours en vers*, 177
- Dogood Papers*, 7
- "Dr. Yorick," 228
- Draper, Lyman C., 333
- Drone Club, 267
- Duché, Jacob, 21
- Duke of Devonshire, 236
- Dunciad, The*, 153
- Dunlap Exhibition, 272
- Dunlap, John Read, 253
- Dunlap, Samuel, 242
- Dunlap Society, 235, 239, 247, 256, 262, 346, 347, 350
- Dunlap, William, 14, 235-75, 283, 288, 292, 293, 312, 346-50; early influences and first efforts at art, 242-46; career as playwright and theater manager, 247-63, 265; André, 254-58; histories of theater, art, and New York, 263-65, 266-68, 272; his work summarized, 274, 275; his Journals quoted, 183, 252-56, 268, 269, 273, 290, 293; bibliography, 346-50

364 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- Dwight, Theodore, 14, 150, 161, 166, 167, 168, 181, 182, 332, 341, 342
Dwight, Timothy, 9, 12, 13, 112, 115, 118, 137, 150, 168, 169, 172, 173, 174, 180, 181, 205-07, 254

E

- Early American Plays*, 235, 248, 259, 262, 346, 350
Echo, The, 161-68, 182, 301
Edgar Huntley, 293, 301, 303, 351
Edwards, Jonathan, 5
"Eglantine," 222
Elizabethan Dramatists, 149
Ella; a Norwegian Tale, 349
"Ella and Birtha," 77
Elliot, Andrew, 244
Emerson, Ralph Waldo, 15, 102
Eminent Philadelphians, 287
Emmons, Nathaniel, 110
"Epistle to Col. Humphreys," 137
Essays on the Constitution of the United States, 322
Etting, Frank M., 314
Everest, Charles W., 186, 335
Ewald, Captain, 55
Ewing, Samuel, 218
Extracts from Democracy, 167

F

- Fairfield, Conn., 180, 181
False Shame, or, the American Orphan, 347
"Farmer Dobbin's Complaint," 94
Farmer, James Eugene, 119
Farmer's Weekly Museum, 200, 202, 209, 213, 214, 215, 344
"Father Abraham," 6
"Father Bumbo's Pilgrimage," 67, 327
"Federalism Triumphant in the Steady Habits," etc., 138, 336
Federalists, The, 45, 46, 61, 81, 82, 151, 158, 163, 164, 165, 167, 168, 204, 216
Fennell, James, 266, 271

- Fenno, John, 77, 81, 83, 84, 85, 214
 Fessenden, F. T. G., 202
 Flatbush, L. I., 68, 184
Fontaineville Abbey, 348
 Ford, Paul Leicester, 6, 22, 34, 178, 237, 322, 323, 326, 350
 Ford, Worthington C., 21, 175, 323
 Forman, Eleanor, 77
 Forman, Dr. Samuel E., 82, 84, 331
 Forman, Major Samuel, 77, 333
Fortnightly Review, 353
Four Dissertations, etc., 23, 324
 "Fractura Minimi Digiti," 274
 Francis, Dr. John, 100, 274, 350
Francis Hopkinson and James Lyon, 26, 327
 Franklin, Benjamin, 5-8, 20, 23, 24, 25, 31, 32, 33, 46, 57, 164,
 193, 230, 236, 284, 322
Freeman's Journal, 47, 50, 76, 94, 330
 Freneau, Agnes Watson, 64
 Freneau, Mary, 65
 Freneau, Pierre, the elder, 63; the younger, 65, 92
 Freneau, Philip, 9, 12, 14, 61-104, 327-32; early life and verses, 61-67; as teacher, 68, 69; political satires, 69-75; as merchant, 76, 77, 92, 94; lyrics of nature and customs, 76, 83, 94; marriage, 77; editor and translator in Philadelphia, 78-85, 89, 90; poems of Indian life, 95-97; personality and later years, 99-102; Miscellaneous Works, 91, 93, 97, 329;
Poems (1786), 75, 76, 93, 97, 329; Poems (1795), 63, 65, 70,
 72, 75, 76, 89, 91, 94, 97, 99, 101, 329; Poems (1815), 87,
 93, 98, 99, 102, 103, 329; bibliography, 327-32
 Fresneau, Andrew, 63
 Friendly Club of Hartford, 150; of New York, 267, 290
 "From Fond Frederic to Fanny False Fair," 201
 Fulton, Robert, 171

G

- Gainé, Hugh, references to, 37, 73; Journals of, 22, 326, 332
 Garrick, David, 236
Gazette of the United States, 77, 81, 83, 84, 85, 86, 174, 214

366 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- "General Gage's Confession," 328
"General Gage's Proclamation," 69, 128, 129
"General Gage's Soliloquy," 70, 328
"Genius of America, The," 137, 156
Giles, W. B., 82
Godfrey, Thomas, 236
Godwin, William, 282, 297
Goodrich, Samuel G., 143, 144, 145, 151, 162, 335
Granger, Gideon, 171, 172
Gray, Thomas, 103, 104
Green, Bartholomew, Jr., 195
Greene, General Nathanael, 156, 174
"Greenfield Hill," 173
Greenleaf, Thomas, 89, 90
Griswold, Rufus, 205, 346
Guillotina for 1797, 337
Guillotina, The, 165, 167, 337

H

- "Hail Columbia," 15, 57
Hale, Nathan, 119
Hall, Harrison, 344
Hall, John E., 194, 197, 228, 344, 345
Hall, Sarah E., 218
Hallam, Lewis, 238, 250, 252
Hamilton, Alexander, 13, 81, 83, 84, 139, 159, 309, 323
Hamilton, Andrew, 20
Hamilton, John C., 159, 323
Hancock, Governor John, 10, 127, 163
"Happiness of America," 181
"Harriet Simper," 123, 124, 334
Hart, Albert Bushnell, 323
Hart, Charles Henry, 346
Hartford, Conn., 132, 138, 150, 183, 185, 252, 253
"Hartford Wits," 137, 149-89, 301
Hartleburg Castle, 26
Harvard College, 97, 111, 149, 194, 195
"Hasty Pudding," 170, 338

- Hawthorne, Nathaniel, 15, 318
 "Hearts of Oak," 11
 "Helvetic Liberty," 251
 Henkels, Stan V., 271
 Henry, Mr. and Mrs. John, 247, 265
 Henry, Patrick, 10, 13
 Herrick, Robert, 44
 Herring, James, 321, 326, 353
 Hildeburne, Charles R., 27, 41, 326, 332
Historic Houses of New Jersey, 326, 332
Historical Magazine, The, 128, 136
 Historical Society of Pennsylvania, vi, 7, 22, 26, 56, 67, 82, 91,
 165, 201, 288, 312, 326, 332, 352
History of American Painting, 264, 270, 350
History of American Literature, 15
History of Carsol, 314
History of Journalism in the United States, 77, 333, 345
History of New Netherlands, 274, 349
History of the American Theatre, 241, 242, 247, 248, 250, 252, 255, 261, 263, 349
History of the City of New York, 248
History of New York City, 350
History of the College of New Jersey, 66, 332
History of the Hartford Convention, 341
History of the Rise and Progress of the Arts of Design, 243, 244, 245, 264, 349
 Hodgkinson, actor (Meadowcraft), 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254
 Hogan, Edmund, 34, 326
 Holmes, Oliver Wendell, 103
 "Honorius," 130, 131, 132
 Hopkins, Joseph, 158
 Hopkins, Dr. Lemuel, 142, 150, 152, 159, 164, 165, 166, 185, 186, 187, 189, 337, 343
 Hopkins Medical Society, 185
 Hopkins, Stephen, 9
 Hopkinson, Francis, 12, 13, 19-58, 70, 95, 129, 323-27; inheritance and youth, 19-21; friendship with Franklin, 24-26;
 friendship with Jefferson, 34-37, 42; "A Pretty Story," 29-31;

368 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- "Battle of the Kegs," 39-41; Seven Songs, 41-43; The New Roof, 47-49; writings on education, etc., 52, 53, 54; personality and elegies, 51, 52, 56-58; bibliography, 323-27
- Hopkinson, Joseph, 57, 218
- Hopkinson, Mrs. Joseph, 223
- Hopkinson, Mrs. Mary, 20, 21, 23, 24, 25
- Hopkinson, Mrs. Oliver, 26, 33, 43, 49, 50, 224, 325
- Hopkinson, Thomas, 20, 23
- "House of Night, The," 72, 73
- Howe, Joseph, 118
- Hubbard, Leverett, 137
- Hubbard, Sarah, 137
- Hudibras*, 134, 136
- Hudson, Frederic, 77, 333, 345
- Hull, Captain Isaac, 98
- Humphreys, David, life and writings, 174-81, 339, 340; references to, 13, 119, 150, 152, 156, 157, 160, 169, 266
- Humphreysville, Conn., 179
- Hunt, Samuel, 203
- Hunter, Mrs. Ann, 95, 97
- Hunter, Governor Robert, 236
- "Hunting-Call," 44
- Hutchinton, Governor, Thomas, 12
- Hutton, Laurence, 272, 350
- "Hypocrite's Hope, The," 187

I

- Illustrated Ballad History of the American Revolution*, 321
- "Il Penseroso," 22, 323
- "Impeachment and Trial of Francis Hopkinson," 34
- Independence Hall, 21, 54
- Independent Gazetteer*, 47
- "Indian Burying-Ground, The," 96
- Indian Character, 96, 97, 302
- Indian poems by Freneau, 95-97
- Initial Studies in American Letters*, 296
- "Interment of Saul," 195
- Irving, Washington, 14, 15, 102, 318

- "Isabelle Sprightly," 117
 Isham, Samuel, 264, 270, 271, 350
Issues of the Press of Pennsylvania, 41, 332

J

- "Jack Dapperwit," 115
 Jackson, Paul, 21
 Jacobinical leaders and plans, 163, 164, 165, 221
Jane Talbot, 303, 153
 Jefferson, Thomas, MS. letters of and to, 34, 35, 36, 44, 78, 305, 306, 325, 352; references to, 13, 34, 43, 44, 65, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 83, 87, 88, 167, 168, 174, 175, 179, 216, 305, 306, 307, 309, 325
Jersey Chronicle, 89, 331
Jerseymen in the Revolution, 71
Jessica, 314
 "Joel Barlow to His Fellow Citizens," 339
 "John Burgoyne's Proclamation," 37
 John St. Theater, 247, 251, 274
Johns Hopkins University Studies, 82, 331
 Johnson, William, 287
 Johnstone, Henry P., 341

K

- Kalorama, 172
 Kearny, James, 64
 Kettell, Samuel, 187, 321, 335
 "King George The Third's Soliloquy," 72
 "King George's Speech to Lord North," 72
 Kingsley, William I., 112, 338
 "Knickerbocker Group," 149
Knickerbocker History of New York, 102, 318
 Koopman, Harry Lyman, 328

L

- "Lake Poets, The," 149
 Lamb, Martha J., 248, 350
 "L'Allegro," 22, 323

370 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- "L'Amoroso," 314
 Latta, James, 21
 Law, Jonathan, 172, 173
Lay Preacher, The, 195, 197, 210, 343, 344
Lay Sermons, 195, 197
Le Jugement de Salomon, 260
 Leacock, John, 237
 Leadbeater, Agnes Freneau, 100
Leatherstocking, 261
 Lee, Richard Henry, 13
 Lenox Library, vi, 201, 328, 334, 338
Letter to Lord Howe, 37
Letter to the Hon. W. R. Spencer, 224
Letter Written by a Foreigner, 29
Letters by Robert Slender, 91, 329, 330
Letters from a Farmer in Pennsylvania, 10, 322
Letters from Silesia, 218
Letters from the Hon. David Humphreys, 340
Letters by Cato to the People of Pennsylvania, 30
Liberty Songs, 11
 Library Company of Philadelphia, vi, 8, 330
Library of American Biography, A, 285, 307, 311, 353
 Library of Congress, 34, 69, 78, 83, 112, 132, 165, 316, 327, 328, 332, 333, 337, 339
Life and Letters of Joel Barlow, 339
Life of Charles Brockden Brown, 283, 285, 286, 312, 314, 349, 352
 Linn, Elizabeth, 311
 Linn, John Blair, 218, 311
 "Lines on Leaving Philadelphia," 223
List of Books Printed in Connecticut, from 1709 to 1800, 336, 338
 Litchfield, Conn., 166, 185, 187
Literary History of Philadelphia, 326, 332
Literary History of the American Revolution, 15, 110, 114, 322,
 327, 333
 Livingston, Henry Brockholst, 167
 Livingstone, William, 5
London Morning Herald, 76
 Longacre, James B., 321, 326, 353

Longfellow, Henry W., 102
 Longworth, David, 93, 98
Lord Leicester, 249, 250, 348
 Lossing, Benson J., 28, 335
Lovers' Vows, 348
 "Lucy Gray," 221

M

Maclean, John, 66, 332, 333
 MacMaster, John Bach, 52, 322
Madison, James, Papers of, 65, 68, 90, 99, 332; references to, 78
 81, 89, 98
 Magaw, Samuel, 21
Magazine of American History, 333, 346
 Malone, John, 262, 346
 "Mark Twain," 151
Marmion, 75
 Marquis de Chastelleux, 127, 136
 Marshall, John, 213
 Mason, Jeremiah, 203, 207, 344
 Massachusetts Historical Society, vi, 78, 112, 177, 183, 207, 211
 328, 344
 Matthews, J. Brander, 256
 "May to April," 76
May Day; or, New York in an Uproar, 239
 Mayhew, Rev. Jonathan, 10
McFingal, or M'Fingal, 127-36, 334, 335
 McKay, David, 316, 351
 McKee, Thomas J., 239, 247, 347
 Meigs, Colonel Return J., 174
Memoirs, Journal, and Correspondence of Thomas Moore, 224, 345
Memoirs of George Fred Cooke, 349
Memoirs of John Quincy Adams, 219, 231, 345
Memoirs of Stephen Calvert, 314
Memoirs of the Administration of Washington and John Adams, 142
Memorial History of Hartford County, 135, 136, 182, 336, 339, 342, 343

372 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- Menut, A., 90
Mercenary Match, The, 238
"Mercutio," 225
Michaux, Dr. Pierre, 274
Middletown, Conn., 183
Mills, W. Jay, 326, 332
Milton, John, 111, 180
Mirabeau, 159; "Mirabeau," 163
Miscellaneous Essays and Occasional Writings, 28, 30, 31, 36, 41, 42, 49, 52, 54, 55, 56, 324
Miscellaneous Works of David Humphreys, 176, 179, 180, 339
Miscellaneous Works of Philip Freneau, 91, 92, 329
"Miserable Life of a Pedagogue, The," 68, 69
Mitchell, Donald G., 136, 322
Modern Chivalry, 282
Modern Learning Exemplified by, etc., 54, 325
Modest Soldier, or Love in New York, 247
"Moggy Lawder," 40
Molina's History of Chili, 183, 342
Monmouth, N. J., 64, 65, 73, 81, 87, 88, 89, 92, 100
Mont Pleasant, 64
Moore, Bishop Channing, 271
Moore, Frank, 11, 321, 322
Moore, Thomas, references to, 57, 222, 223, 224, 225; writings of, 224, 344, 345
Morewood, Mr., 207
Morris, George P., 271, 272
Morris, Gouverneur, 50, 218
Morris, Lewis R., 211, 212
Morris, Robert, 49, 164
Morton, Sarah Wentworth, 280
Mount Vernon, 175, 176; ode, 176
"My Generous Heart Disdains," 44

N

- Narrative of a Journey down the Ohio*, 77, 333
Nassau Hall, 65, 149
National Academy of Design, 270, 271

- National Gazette*, 45, 81, 82, 83, 85, 90, 94, 214, 331
New and Original Lay Sermons, 227, 344
New England Galaxy, 198, 346
New England Magazine, 350
New England Primer, 109
New Haven Gazette, 151, 153, 154, 337
New Jersey Gazette, 39
New Roof, The, 47, 48, 49, 50, 324
 "New Travels of M. Abbé Robin," 90
 New York City, 63, 64, 77, 78, 79, 80, 90, 94, 100, 101, 129, 143,
 222, 226, 238, 239, 244, 248, 250, 287, 291, 308, 315
New York Daily Advertiser, 77
New York Daily Gazette, 246
 New York Historical Society, vi, 26, 128, 165, 182, 245, 252, 268, 272, 328
New York Journal, 90
New York Mercury, 22, 326
New York Mirror, 332
New York Spectator, 71, 332
 Nicholson, John, 164
 Niles, Nathaniel, 12
 Norfolk, 266, 268, 269, 308
North American Review, 296, 353
 North, Lord, 12, 23, 26, 29

O

- Oakwood Press, The, 41
 Oberholtzer, Ellis Paxson, 326, 332, 345, 353
 "Ode to Fancy," 99
 "Ode to Liberty," 98
 "Ode to Sleep," 118, 119
 "Of Precipitation," 196
 Ogden, Aaron, 65
 Old New York, 274, 350
 "Oliver Oldschool," 215, 344
 "On a Patient Killed by a Cancer Quack," 187
 "On Annual White-Washings," 56, 325
 "On the Pleasures of Study," 229

374 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- "On the Sleep of Plants," 83
 "One of the People," 38
Origin of McFingal, 69, 128, 129, 136, 336
Ormond, or, the Secret Witness, 297, 351
 Orwell, Vermont, 270
 Ossian, 132, 183
 Otis, James, 10, 127
 "Our Saviour and Mary Magdalene," painting, 271
 Oxford Movement, 149

P

- Paine, Thomas, 129
 Paltsits, Victor Hugo, 61, 69, 77, 129, 327, 328, 331
Pamphlets on the Constitution of the United States, 323
 Park, Dr. E. A., 110
 Park Theater, 251, 258
 Parsons, Theophilus, 220, 221
 "Pasquin Petronius," 162, 337
 Pattee, Fred L., 61, 64, 88, 330
 Patterson, William, 48
 Paulding, J. K., 318
 Penelopen, 65
Pennsylvania Gazette, 53
Pennsylvania Ledger, 39
Pennsylvania Magazine of History and Biography, 27, 28, 55,
 315, 326, 353
Pennsylvania Magazine or American Monthly Museum, 324
Pennsylvania Packet, 38, 41, 48, 76, 97, 324, 325, 329
Pennsylvania State Trials, 34, 326
 Pequot Library, 170, 173, 339
 Perth Amboy, 242, 243, 267, 292, 350
 "Peter Grievous," 28, 324
 "Peter Parley," 143, 144
 "Peter Pindar of America," 94
 "Peter Porcupine," 164
 "Peter Quince," 203
 Peters, Richard, 20
 Philadelphia, City of, 8, 22, 24, 27, 35, 36, 52, 53, 56, 57, 76, 78,

- 79, 81, 83, 84, 88, 94, 98, 129, 194, 205, 212, 214, 215, 222,
224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 266, 271, 284, 291, 292, 298, 309,
315, 316, 317, 326, 332, 345, 353
Philadelphia Jockey Club, 164, 165
Philadelphia Souvenir, The, 194, 198, 228, 345
"Philadelphiensis," 47
Philip Freneau, The Huguenot Poet-Patriot, 332
Philip Freneau, The Poet of the Revolution, 73, 87, 88, 331
Pickering, Timothy, 78, 177, 211, 212, 213; Papers, 78, 79, 211, 213, 332, 344
"Pilot of Hatteras, The," 83, 94
Pintard, John, 77, 78
Piscatawa, 244
Poe, Edgar Allen, 72, 318
"Poem Addressed to the Armies," 176, 177
"Poetical Address to Franklin," 286
"Political Activities of Philip Freneau, The," 82, 84, 331
"Political Greenhouse, The," 166, 337
Ponteach, 236
"Poor Richard," 6
Pope, Alexander, 19, 103, 114, 153, 199
"Porcupine Press," 162
Porter, General P. B., 271
Potter, Dr. Jared, 185
Post, Dr. Wright, 274
"Powers of Genius," 311
Pre-Raphaelites, 149
Prescott, William H., Sketch of Brown, 285, 307, 311, 353
Prime, Dr. Benjamin, 5, 9
Princess Anne Academy, 68
Progress of Dulness, 54, 115, 119, 120-24, 333
Proposals Relating to the Education, etc., 7, 322
Proud, Robert, 285
Provincial Council of New Jersey, 27
Putnam, General Israel, 174, 175, 340
- Q
- Quincy, Edmund, 217, 345
Quincy, Josiah, 217, 218, 266, 345

376 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

R

- Radcliffe, Ann, 282
 Raritan River, 244
 Raynal, Abbé, 159, 160
Reciprocal Advantages of a Perpetual Union, 23
Recollections of a Lifetime, 144, 145, 151, 162
 Reeve, Judge Tappan, 151
Repository of the Lives, etc., 51
Ribbemont, or the Feudal Baron, 260, 347
 "Richard and Kenneth," painting, 271
 Riggs, Luther G., 151, 337
Rights of the Colonies, 9
 Riley, Isaac, 162, 337
Rinaldo Rinaldini, 260, 261, 348
Rip Van Winkle, 318
 "Rise and Progress of the Differences," 10
 Rivington, James, 37, 73
 "Robert Slender," 91, 92
 Robertson, William, 159, 160
 Rogers, Major Robert, 236
Rolliad, The, 153
 Root, Mary P., 341
 Rowson, Susanna, 281
 Royal West India Company, 63
 Runic Poetry, 183, 342

S

- Salmagundi Papers*, 102, 318
 Sanderson, John, 326
 Santa Cruz, 71
 Sarah Riggs Humphreys Chapter, 174
 Sargent, John, M.P., 23
 Sargent, Margaret, 242
 Scandella, Dr. Joseph, 291
 "Scene from Cooper's 'The Spy,'" painting, 271, 272
 Scharf and Westcott's History of Philadelphia, 345, 353
 "Science," a poem, 22, 324
 Scott, John Morin, 63

- Scott, Sir Walter, 75
Seilhamer, George O., 263, 264, 350
Seven Songs for the Harpsichord and Forte Piano, 42, 43, 44, 324
Seymour, Past and Present, 174, 179, 341
Sharpe, William C., 341
Shay's Rebellion, 153, 155, 176
Shelley, Percy B., 297
Shelty's Travels, 249
Shinn, Mrs. Florence Scovel, 24, 38, 325
"Shop of Colon and Spondee," 201, 203, 218
Sigourney, Mrs. Lydia Huntley, 140, 141
"Simon Spunkey," 202
Simpson, Henry, 287
"Six Hours Lodging with Death," 72
Sketch Book, The, 102
Sketch of [Joseph] Dennie, 198, 345
Sketches of a History of the Carrils and Ormes, 314
Smith, Dr. Elihu, 161, 166, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 321
Smith, Rev. William, 22, 30, 55
Smith, Zephaniah, 151
Society of the Cincinnati, 157
Some Account of the Capture of the Ship Aurora, 73, 330
Songs and Ballads of the Revolution, 11, 322
Sonneck, O. G., 26, 327
Southern Literary Messenger, 66
Southey, Robert, 180
Southmayd, William, 109
Southport, Conn., 170, 339
Sparks, Jared, 285
Specimens of American Poetry, 184, 187, 201, 321, 335
"Star-Spangled Banner, The," 16
Stedman, Edmund Clarence, 62, 321
Sterne, Lawrence, 229
Stone, William L., 350
Story, Isaac, 203
Stowe, Harriet Beecher, 151
Swanwick, John, 53
Swift, Jonathan, 19, 199, 229

T

- "T. L.," 84, 85
 Tayloe, John, 172
 Taylor, George, Jr., 78
 Tennent, Rev. William, 65
 Thacher, James, 39, 185, 327, 343
 "Thanatopsis," 102
The Adulateur, 237
The Author, 66, 67
The Africans, 260, 348
The Algerine Captive, 239, 281
 "The Almanack-Maker," 76
 "The American Hero," 12
The American Mercury, 337
The American Nation, 323
The American Register, 313, 352
The American Review and Literary Journal, 296, 352
The American Village, 69, 327
The Anarchiad, 151-60, 176, 188, 337
The Archers, 251, 252, 253, 347
The Battle of Brooklyn, 237
The Battle of Bunker's Hill, 12, 237
The Battle of New Orleans, 260
The Blind Boy, 260, 348
The Blockheads, 236
The Blockheads, or Fortunate Contractor, 238
 "The British Prison-Ship," 73, 74, 328
 "The British Spy," 220
 "The Brook of the Valley," 101, 102
 "The Canal," 171, 339
The Character of Thomas Jefferson as Exhibited, etc., 332, 342
 "The Charms of Fancy," 169, 342
 "The Columbiad," 169, 170, 339
The Columbian Magazine, 57, 287, 323, 326, 351
The Columbian Songster, 95
The Contrast, 96, 201, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 246
 "The Correspondent," 117
 "The Country Printer," 83

- "The Death-Song of a Cherokee Indian," 95, 331
 "The Decadents," 149
The Democratiad, 164, 165, 337, 343
 "The Deserted Farm-House," 76
 "The Destruction of Babylon," 125
The Dunciad, 153
 "The Dying Elm," 72
The Echo, 161-68, 182, 301, 337
 "The Enchanted Lake," etc., 342
 "The Farrago," 200, 201
The Fatal Deception, 249
The Father of an Only Child, 347
The Father; or, American Shandyism, 235, 247, 259, 346, 347
 "The Genius of America," 137
The Georgia Spec, 239
The Ghost, 134
The Glory of Columbia, 258, 260, 348
The Gold Bug, 318
The Group, 12, 237
The Guillotina, 165, 167, 343
 "The Hall of Fantasy," 318
 "The Hermit," 76, 202
 "The Historic Muse," painting, 270, 272
 "The House of Night," 72
 "The Hypocrite's Hope," 187
 "The Indian Burying-Ground," 96
 "The Indian Student," 76, 96
The Inquisitor, 281
The Italian Father, 348
 "The Jug of Rum," 83
 "The Last Will and Testament," etc., 74
 "The Last Words," etc., 328
The Lay Preacher, 195, 210, 343, 344
The Literary History of the American Revolution, see Literary History
The Literary Magazine and American Register, 179, 308, 310, 352
 "The Man at Home," 292, 351
 "The Meddler," 115, 116, 202

380 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- The Memorial History of the City of New York*, 332, 350, 353
 "The Midnight Consultations," 69, 70
 "The Miserable Life of a Pedagogue," 68, 69
 "The Monk," 282
 "The Monkey Fable," 180
The Monmouth Inquirer, 331
The Monthly Magazine and American Review, 308, 352
 The Motley Assembly, 237
The Mysteries of Udolpho, 282
The National Portrait Gallery, 321, 326, 353
The New Roof, 47, 48, 49, 50, 324
 "The Old Farm and the New Farm," 28, 324
 "The Owl and the Sparrow," 126
 "The Parting Glass," 101
The Pioneers, 301
The Poets of Connecticut, 186, 335, 342
The Political Writings of Joel Barlow, 339
The Portfolio, 205, 209, 214, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 225, 226, 227, 310, 344
 "The Power of Sympathy," 280, 282
The Prince of Parthia, 236
The Prophecy, 74
 "The Prospect of Peace," 338
 "The Rhapsodist," 287
 "The Rights of Man," 95
 "The Rights of Women," 292, 351
The Rising Glory of America, 65
The Ruins of Innocence, 282
 "The Schemer," 115, 116
The Soldier of Seventy-Six, 260
The Spectator, 158
The Spirit of the Farmer's Museum, 202, 344
The Suspected Daughter, 236
The Tablet, 200, 201, 202, 214, 344
 "The Triumph of Democracy," 167, 341
 "The Veil Removed," 341
 "The Vision of Columbus," 170, 338
 "The Vision of Night," 72

- The Voice of Nature*, 259, 260
The Washington-Duché Letters, 21, 327
The Weekly Magazine, 292, 293, 308, 351
The Widow of Malabar, 339
 "The Wild Honeysuckle," 76
The Yankey in England, 179, 341
The Yankey in London, 239
Thirty Years Ago, 349
 Thomas, Alexander, 207
 Thomas, Isaiah, 200, 204, 280
 Thoreau, Henry David, 149
Three Men of Letters, 170, 339
Time-Piece and Literary Companion, 90, 331
 "Timothy Tickler," 164
 Tisdale, Elkanah, 162
 "To a Catydid," 103
 "To an Insect," 103
 "To a Waterfowl," 184
 "To a Young Lady Who Requested," etc., 126
 "To Julia," 222
 "To the Americans of the United States," 88
 "To the Memory of the Brave Americans," etc., 74
 "To the Freemen of Connecticut," 183, 342
 Todd, Charles Burr, 170, 339
 "Tom Brainless," 120, 121, 124, 334
 Town and City of Waterbury, Conn., 108, 336, 343
 Tracey, Uriah, 151
 "Transcendentalists, The," 149
 Translation of the Psalms of David, 26
 Trent, W. P., 298, 322
 Trumble, John, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111
 Trumbull, Benoni, 107
 Trumbull, James Hammond, 69, 128, 129, 135, 136, 182, 336
 Trumbull, John, artist, 107, 145, 264, 272
 Trumbull, John, writer, 9, 12, 13, 14, 54, 70, 107-45, 150, 152, 158, 161, 166, 168, 181, 182, 203; boyhood and college days, 109-15; as essayist, 115-17; Progress of Dulness, 119-24; M'Fingal, 127-36; judge, 136; last years and tributes, 138-43; bibliography, 333-36

382 HERALDS OF AMERICAN LITERATURE

- Trumbull, Governor Jonathan, 107, 130, 138, 157
Tuesday Club, 217
Twitchell, Rev. Joseph, 151
"Two is Better than One," 228
Tyler, Moses Coit, 15, 110, 119, 170, 322, 339
Tyler, Royall, 96, 198, 201, 202, 238, 239, 240, 241, 246, 281, 282
Tyler, Thomas P., 239

U

- "Ulalume," 72
United States Magazine, 72, 331

V

- Valedictory Address before the Cincinnati, 340
Vaughan, Henry, 44
Vaux, George, 315
Verplanck, G. C., 272
"Verses to a Shearwater," 184, 342
Victoria, 281
Victorian Novelists, 149
Vilas, Martin S., 316, 353
Volney, C. F., 352
Vose, Royal, 203
Vreeland, Helen Kearny, 73, 331

W

- Walpole, N. H., 200, 201, 208, 228
"Walpole as It Was and as It Is," 203, 204, 345
War of 1812, 9, 13, 98, 181, 260
Warner, Charles Dudley, 151
Warren, Caroline, 282
Warren, Mercy, 12, 237
Washington and the Theatre, 248, 350
Washington, George, references to, 13, 21, 33, 41, 42, 43, 45, 46, 81, 87, 103, 156, 160, 165, 174, 182, 185, 240, 245, 248, 249, 258, 286, 323, 341
"Washington's March," 258
Waterbury, Conn., 107, 138, 185
Watkinson Library, 112, 132, 333, 334

- Watts, Isaac, 109
 Webster, Noah, 139
 Wegelin, Oscar, 235, 248, 259, 262, 346
 West, Benjamin, 26, 245, 246, 264, 283
 West, Samuel, 194
 Westbury, Conn., 107, 108
 Whitehead, William A., 243, 350
 Whitehill, Robert, 48
 Whittier, John G., 102
Wieland, or the Transformation, 283, 294-97, 305, 351
 Wigglesworth, Michael, 5
 Wignell, Thomas, 238, 239, 240, 248, 249
 Wilkinson, William, 287
 Williams, William, 157, 158, 245
 Williamson, Hugh, 21
 Wilson, James, 48
 Wilson, James Grant, 332, 350, 353
 Wilson, Woodrow, 323
 "Wimble War," 158
 "With Jemmy on the Sea," 44, 95,
 Wolcott, Oliver, Jr., 142, 143, 174, 187, 203, 336, 339
 Woodbridge, Dudley Bradstreet, 139, 140
 Woodbridge, Mrs. William, 140, 143
 Woolman, John, 5
 Woolsey, Elizabeth, 246
 Wordsworth, William, 221, 222
 "Wrongheads," 157

X

- "X. Y. Z.," 316, 317, 353

Y

- "Yale and Her Honor Roll in the American Revolution," 341
 Yale College and University, 110, 111, 112, 117, 118, 119, 124,
 150, 181, 185
Yankee Chronology, 260, 348
 "Yankee Doodle," 15

FOUND

APR 15 1938

[Faint, illegible handwritten notes and smudges on the top page of the notebook]

DO NOT REMOVE OR MUTILATE CARD

